Or take a different case. Professor Edwards, emeritus, retired from the University of So-and-so twenty-five years ago and is now dead at ninety-six in Florida. The university is far away and not very well known to me, and I can only take on faith the information that the old professor used to cut quite a figure on the campus, especially in winter with his beaver cap and in any season with his gibes at late comers. The obituary account lists an impressive number of learned societies to which he belonged. I am informed that his monographs on the history of his native county are well known to all students of that rather special subject. It appears that he rose briefly to national celebrity about thirty years ago when he was widely quoted as having said in a Phi Beta Kappa address that a college education ruined a man's intellect and atrophied his spirit. There was, the paper says, heated controversy at the time. Part of the pleasure of reading the obituaries is in filling in what the writer has perhaps forgotten or failed to turn up among the ancient clippings he has assembled. It suddenly comes back to me that I read about the whole business while I was in high school. It turned out that the professor was misquoted. What he actually said was that without a college education, the intellect was killed and the spirit atrophied. But by the time denials were made, the discussion had acquired too much momentum to be stopped.

Time and again there crop up in the obituary columns mysterious wealthy persons. The mystery is this: their wealth is so great, apparently, that it is remarkable one should not have heard about them before. Unknown to me, unknown I suspect to everyone, they and their modest multi-millions have flourished in the decent reticence of a distant small community. Orphanages all over the country, I learn, have long flourished under their anonymous patronage, and in some instances the peonies they have raised have won national prizes. Apparently lifelong foes or fumlbers of publicity, it is an irony that their distinction, if only of opulence, comes to light for the first time now that they have ceased to see the sun.

Then there are the repeated moral lessons of the obituary pages. It is a rare week that does not produce an account, sometimes far down the page, of the forgotten theatrical stars of a generation ago, or the heroes and heroines of the silent screen, made anachronistic by an invention that served for them only to reveal their impossible flat voices, flat even for Hollywood, or their incurably illiterate diction. The obituaries do not say that, but one recalls hearing about it at the time. As for the stage stars of an earlier period, how Marcus Aurelius would have reveled in reading of their end, and moralized sadly on the transience of fame, the precariousness of friendship and of money! The darling of operetta in the nineties dead in poverty in a South Dakota village. (Tears may be in order. But Mozart died in poverty in Vienna at thirty-five.) I read of the architects of buildings one has passed every morning or of the manufacturers of tooth paste I have used every day, of the writers of best-sellers long since forgotten, of the creators of styles or inventions now routine.

And then there are, not least instructive, the notices of the passing of relics of an era now definitely over—the dowager whose word was once law in a Four Hundred itself now a memory, the giver of magniloquently vulgar parties on the Riviera when that azure region was a paradise of the Anglo-American smart set. Other times, other manners! Sometimes I confess I turn back with relief even to the anxieties on the front page. For these events are of today and point to hopes and fears for tomorrow. Meanwhile the obituary page is for that very reason not a bad form of escape literature, with the risk always of the shock of finding on it any day a name one had hoped never to live to see there, and the further risk of realizing with a sudden sinking of the heart in how few lines one's own contribution to his time could be summarized.

Sometimes I suspect that the most significant lives as a God or a God-inspired novelist might see them never get into the obituaries at all or into that pantheon of respectability, the paid death announcements. What rescues—or corrupts—a man from anonymity is some obvious public mark of eminence or success, some recognizable standard brand of good or ill he has done in the world. The things that transmute an existence into a life are not those that render it notable or quotable; these are too intimate, lyric, and universal. Even the good or evil that most men do most deeply is not what is available for public record or singular enough to seem worth recording. The unknown soldier is vaguely remembered for his courage; the nameless citizen for his run-of-the-mill patience or his fumlblings, his oddities, his ardors, or his failures. The obituaries of the human being in his undistinguished humanity can seldom be written or seem worth writing save to the small circle, usually nameless also and inarticulate, by whom he was beloved. The very great, like the humble, do not provide the characteristic materials for modern obituaries. Human dignity has other measures than the obvious ones of contemporary celebrity.

Still, I hope some day, some distant day, an obituary writer will recall that I once wrote a rueful tribute to obituaries.

Wrapped in a Mystery

THE ENIGMA OF ADMIRAL DARLAN. By Alec de Montmorency. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

WHEN a book offers startling facts unsupported by any document, it may still have a certain degree of validity if some authority attaches to the author's name, or if the work presents a consistent, plausible hypothesis. In this case, both these conditions are lacking.

M. Alec de Montmorency is an enigma wrapped in a mystery. We are told that his identity cannot be revealed "for obvious reasons." The reasons seem obvious to me; but they had better remain undefined. However, let us give M. de Montmorency the full benefit of the doubt. Let us assume that his name is Alec (that is appropriate enough) and that he comes from the charming little village near Paris famed for Jean-Jacques Rousseau, cherries, and donkey rides. That does not make his story more convincing. He would have us believe that Pétain, Weygand, and Darlan had prepared a Legitimist coup de chien, or putsch, with Alfonso XIII as their candidate. For this tall tale he offers not a particle of evidence. But his mind is hopelessly confused about that small knot of Legitimists known as les Blancs d'Espagne. Their candidate was not Alfonso but the Carlist Pretender; Alfonso, in their eyes, was a usurper, like Louis Philippe. Incidentally, M. de Montmorency casts doubt on the "legitimacy" of the Count of Paris: the legitimacy, not of his claims, but of his birth. I hope that some Royalist will argue the point with M. de Montmorency—if he can be found.

Another story is that Darlan planned to "concentrate" all naval officers with Republican leanings on a single ship, the "old Jean-Bart," with M. Pierre Cot as admiral. The Jean-Bart was then to be torpedoed. That is the kind of galéjades that the Marseilles people liked to swap in the cafes of their beloved Cannubiére: the hoariest of them all is about the monstrous sardine that once blocked the entrance of the old harbor.

Except for these two lurid tales, there is nothing in the book that any casual newspaper reader did not know. But even the simplest statements appear in a blur, so that we never get a clear idea of what Darlan actually said or did. This is particularly true of the fateful days between our landing in North Africa and Darlan's masterly capture of his captors. On this, and on Darlan's death, M. de Montmorency throws no light whatever. The portrait he offers us—paladin, blackguard, Legitimist who was the son of a Republican minister, and who won advancement by out-drinking Daladier—would be an amusing caricature if it were intelligible. But no attempt is made to fit the pieces together. The title of the book is "Admiral Darlan": it might as well be "Nude Descending a Staircase."

WALTER DURANTY: "I have read many books about Russia and written one or two myself, but this one explains more neatly than any other the how and why of Soviet Russia and why and how the Russians are fighting so bravely."—N. Y. Times Book Rev.

IS GERMANY INCURABLE?

RICHARD M. BRICKNER, M.D.

Twice in one generation Germany has thrown the world into the convulsions of war. Why? What mental state drives the enemy of our civilization to mass murder? Here is psychiatry's new and startling revelation.

CLIFTON FADIMAN: "One of the sanest explanations yet offered of how the Germans got that way . . . really illuminates the mind of the reader and sets some of the problems of winning the war and the peace in large and true perspective."

HENDRIK WILLEM VAN LOON: "Dr. Brickner is the first man to show us in what direction to look for the unavoidable solution of the German problem. Here at last is sense in the midst of oceans of nonsense."

MARQUIS JAMES: "I don't see how anyone who has pondered the question of what to do with Germany after the fighting can put this book down once he has started it. I feel so strongly that every American should read it that as soon as the rest of my family has read it I'm sending my copy to our village library."

no great admirer of Admiral Darlan: but the account of him offered in this book is damaging beyond the dreams of his worst enemies. What is more, I believe that a good case could be made for the dynamic little Admiral. In the general collapse the fleet remained France's supreme asset. So long as it remained in being, France had a bargaining point with Hitler—and with England as well. I am ready to believe that Darlan was a patriot of the Richelieu-Bismarck-Hitler school: ambitious, for self and country, ruthless, unscrupulous, but on a scale which ceases to be purely contemptible. I am too good an American to admit that our diplomats were bested by an egregious scoundrel or a fool. It was not because he was a "traitor" to France, to the Republic, or to Pétain that I deprecated any compromise with him; but because he represented the very kind of fanatical patriotism against which we are at war.

A serious study of Darlan, if it were possible now, could be fascinating as well as instructive. But this is not a study: it is a would-be thriller that utterly fails to thrill. Life is earnest: let us turn to serious things, and read Edgar Wallace's "Silinski."

"Non-Combatants"

DYNAMITE CARGO: CONVOY TO RUSSIA. By Fred Herman. The Vanguard Press. $2.

THE STORY OF DR. WASSELL. By James Hilton. An Atlantic Monthly Press Book. Little, Brown and Company. $1.50.

HERE are two studies of how non-fighting men behave in the terrifying crises of war. Fred Herman, son of an upstate New York bookstore proprietor, tells how he and his fellow merchant seamen aboard an explosives-laden Liberty ship almost, but not quite, reached Russia in an Arctic convoy. On the other side of the world, we have James Hilton's account of the simple heroism of a fifty-eight-year-old navy doctor who shepherded his wounded flock out of Java just ahead of the Japanese.

Fred Herman, who got the idea of going to sea from Conrad and who spent his spare hours on the Atlantic reading Sandburg's life of Lincoln, points up no heroes, but takes men the way he finds them and makes them real. There was dead-pan Willy who gazed at seagulls for hours: he shipped to Russia because "the wages was high" and he wanted to buy fancy furniture for his kid brother who was getting married. Willy did not live to collect the wages. There was the Salesman, bald-headed, embittered trouble-maker with a grudge against the world; when a little group of seamen thought they had been abandoned aboard their foundering ship, the Salesman's reaction was to scream denunciations of the departed captain: "He ain't in command no more. He can't shove me around no more." And there was the captain himself, the Old Man, nearly seventy, who had locked up his Texas ranch and returned to the sea because merchant skippers were needed; he had already been torpedoed twice before he took command of this ship.

It is almost unbelievable that men could stay sane through the horror of that Arctic passage as Fred Herman describes it, simply and vividly and almost without adjectives. One clear day they could look far down the convoy as the German planes attacked. "One after another, then, the ships in that line began to go. It was sickening, like watching a slaughter. You could guess their cargoes by the sound of the explosions and the color of the smoke that belched up." The men knew there could be few survivors. They also knew that a man blown into that Arctic water might survive as long as sixty minutes.

Finally a torpedo crippled their ship, and except for a few who were killed the men were transferred to a British cruiser. There the torture was even worse, for they had to stay below deck while the cruiser fought its way through a rain of bombs and tried to dodge torpedoes both from the air and from U-boats below. They could feel the concussions, but couldn't fight back and couldn't see what was happening. By way of preserving their sanity, a young British officer on the bridge was detailed to give them a running account over the ship's amplifier. During a lull he told them he was going to play draughts with another officer, and a steward hung up a big checkerboard down below so they could follow the game and make bets on it. Later Mr. Herman learned that the young officer read off the moves through the amplifier from a printed form; there was no game being played.

Almost 4 per cent of the seamen who take out the merchantmen have been lost, as compared with a death rate in the armed services of less than three per cent. "We don't claim to be heroes," says Mr. Herman. "We are the bums. But we deliver the cargoes." Terrified as they were, these bums didn't crack up in the pinches; they kept on doing their jobs. Mr. Herman himself signed on again. One hopes that a young man who can write so honest and moving a book will live to write more.

The tale of Dr. Wassell's adventure in Java was told in brief by President Roosevelt in a broadcast a year ago. Mr. Hilton, creator of the celebrated Mr. Chips, talked at length to the doctor, to his friends and relatives, and to some of the sailors he looked after. Then Mr. Hilton reconstructed the story in swift-flowing fictional form.

Old Dr. Wassell from Arkansas had been a medical missionary in China and later a CCC physician in the South and never had attained any glittering success. Two years ago last February he found himself assigned as navy liaison doctor with forty-one injured men from the Houston and the Marblehead in a Dutch hospital near Surabaya. The men were getting adequate care; so he didn't have much to do at first. He bought them ice cream and talked the Dutch superintendent into letting them smoke. When it became obvious that the Japanese were about to overwhelm Java and that these men would be left behind to be captured, the mouse-like Dr. Wassell turned into a bold conspirator and a fighting leader. He stuck by his wounded men through the panic of evacuation, and by his conniving and bullying and dogged courage got even the stretcher cases off to safety.

Mr. Hilton's version of the episode makes entertaining reading, and no doubt will make a gripping movie. Without in any way belittling Dr. Wassell, one can almost hear the crescendo of the theater organ at heart-throb points throughout the pages.

MARCUS DUFFIELD

Citizen of the World

THE WORLD OF YESTERDAY. An Autobiography by Stefan Zweig. The Viking Press. $3.

THIS was a happy man. After sixty years he killed himself. In his farewell letter he put down all that he thought worth striving for in life. He wanted to be a gentleman; he wanted to "build his life"; his "purest joy" was "intellectual labor"; the "highest good on earth" was "personal freedom." "I, the all too impatient one"—that is what he called himself.

There is Zweig's very typical last statement. There are final dispositions. The completed manuscripts are to be sent to the publishers. Order reigns, and urbanity. An expression of thanks to the host country is not forgotten. There is the ornate, dramatized language so dear to him and his readers throughout the world. A "final duty calls him." he will "part from life—of my own free will and in my right mind." These are the proper, prescribed formulas. Nor is the measured plaint lacking, at the "long years of homeless wandering." It all but rhymes. And twice he crossed out words that did not fit.

Zweig was an Austrian, the son of a Viennese millionaire, a Jew—all by birth. What he made of himself was an author, a humanist, a pacifist. This book, supposed to tell the story of his life, is no autobiography. It is a sequence of background views of his time, interlarded with portraits of the famous men he met; in his Preface Zweig refers to himself as "the pivotal point" of his volume. "Time paints the picture." He promises a report on "an entire generation." He talks of three worlds—pre-war, between wars, post-war—and several existences. The disillusioned citizen of the world calls himself "the homeless man" who "belongs nowhere." He scouts "that arch-plague, nationalism," the new barbarism "with its deliberate and programmatic dogma of anti-humanitarianism." He deplores our new simultaneous organization, which constantly involves us in every world event—without protection, safety, or escape.

He devotes eight chapters to the "World of Security" before the first war, to school and college days, pre-war eroticism, visits to Paris and trips to India and America. The other eight deal with the war of 1914, the battle for "intellectual brotherhood," Switzerland in the last war, Austria and Berlin in the inflation, worldwide travel, worldwide fame, worldwide success, and the era of Adolf Hitler, including exile.

It is the life and the book of a classicist—full of tradition and composure, stylized from birth to death, with rounded sentences, rounded sentiments, a hundred qualms, one great passion (hate of the crime of war), one distinct inclination (always to serve literature), and one profound resentment, of the loss of individual dignity under the new barbarism. Love of spiritual greatness—the only moral greatness—raised him out of the narrow bourgeois world, whose perfect heir he would otherwise have been. Resentment at the loss of human dignity turned this anti-metaphysical writer into a Christian figure. And the hatred of war which made him "the last pacifist" gives life and truth to this tale of a poet's education.

Zweig says he was surprised by his worldwide success. He began as a translator, a born mediator between foreign literatures and civilizations. He became known through writing a pacifist play, "Jeremiah," during the last war. He was successful with erotic novelettes. He became world-famous for his psychological biographies. Eventually, for a few years, he was the world's most translated author.

Endowed with the Old Austrian gifts for comedy and feuilleton writing, a conventional writer with all the postures of boldness, a gentle moralist and highly skilled popularizer—he was born to succeed. Just as, an actuary of his fortune, he computed his life in order to "build" it, everything in his books—the seemingly dramatic fire and the pretended historical points—was calculated, too, with a will to success. But calculation is an essential element of art.

This is a mute book—the autobiography—with the untold private life. "Anonymity in every respect of life is a necessity to me." It contains no love story, no story of marriage, and only a few scattered notes on his work or personal anecdotes, such as that of the thief he refused to prosecute, who carried his stolen trunk back from the police station to the hotel. (The manager, incensed at Zweig for having pardoned the thief, ejected him.)

Stefan Zweig was far too chaste to write a real autobiography. Over modest, he was afraid of nudity. This secret prude may never have written a truly naked word, although at times he committed shameless acts such as that biography of Marie Antoinette (popular for just that reason) in which the story of the French Revolution—or the world—looks like a footnote to Freud's psychoanalytical lectures.

Zweig was a hedonist of the best type, and a noble human being. His was a gentle heart. He was a friend of peace, and of poets. With spiritual means and high ideals he found millions of readers—a universal pedagogical merit of the first order.

He made friends wherever he went. He was a kind man, without malice, full of enthusiasm for greatness of spirit, and he liked to help. He worked all his life, left a vast body of work behind but always found time to discover, advise, aid, and protect the young or new or great poets of many countries in Europe. He started, and originally selected, one of the most beautiful editions of books in the German language, the Insel-Bücher. He helped to influence and shape the literary taste of Europe—almost always improving it. He advised publishers in ten countries, including the United States. He helped many people with money and influence, word and deed, and he saved the lives of some.

Zweig came from polyglot, super-national Austria-Hungary with the ideal of a good European, a citizen of the world—the finest ideal of German literature since Goethe, Schiller, and Heine. His second home was in France; he was at home in Europe. But the poet's victories are complete—in fact, immeasurable—and lethal. When Zweig lost his country, because of Hitler and the moral weakness of Europe, he turned from a citizen of the world into an enemy alien. When he lost his passport, he saw himself as an alien enemy of life. He despised the "pathological suspicion of everybody against everybody else" and the "morbid dislike of the foreigner." The war pursued the pacifist to England, to the United States, to Brazil. Rilke's word, "War is always prison," became fatal for Zweig.

This humblest of all world celebrities had the bourgeois pride to scout all outward distinctions, medals, or titles. He had the civic virtue to shun tyrants. He had the pride of all good literati; his ideal figures were Jeremiah, the moral preacher and prophet, and Erasmus, the anti-revolutionary sage and skeptic. His fine, unselfish admiration of spiritual greatness in others made him a singular figure in the literary world. He had genius as a collector, merit as a mediator, popularity as a writer, happiness as a master of the art of living—until the century ceased to have room for either individualists or individualities.

HERMANN KESTEN

Fiction in Review

CHARLES MILLS'S "The Choice" (Macmillan, $3) is a first novel of considerable talent. To be sure, it has grave faults of style: its young hero, David Lennox, has too many "feelings"; his emotions strain at the prose and some of the most crucial moments in his intellectual development are almost unintelligible. Then Mr. Mills is over-fond of quasi-poetical abstractions in language; sentences like the following are typical, and wearing: "He sat for a long time, and he felt himself growing to the very limits of touch, beyond which was being. He felt a happiness such as he never had known before, for just beyond his sight, just beyond his understanding, was the perfection of all things, and in this time to know its being brought promise to its supremest fullness, and desire into a foretaste of peace." But what constitutes Mr. Mills's talent is his ability, in spite of his wordiness, to evoke scene, and his method of patiently building character. In its prose "The Choice" suggests Thomas Wolfe; in its method of creating character it bears a certain resemblance to "The Last Puritan." Perhaps the chief element in Mr. Mills's talent is his respect for what a novel should do.

But with this salute to its author's gifts, I can go on to say that "The Choice" is a very distressing book—quiet, yet one of the most distressing books I have read recently. It is a novel of Southern reaction and an archetypal one; that is, what other writers may betray only unconsciously, Mr. Mills is sufficiently educated and conscious to state boldly. For granted that violence, prejudice, myth-making, anti-intellectualism are everywhere in the air these days, in the North as well as in the South, still the rankling bitterness that obsesses the South even these many years after the Civil War, and the formulated myths and prejudices which always seem to be at hand to give form and direction to violence, make reactionary novels of a Southern background especially frightening to the liberal Northern reader. And yet, in most such cases the reaction is likely to be so much a matter of cultural tone that it defies a political label; the cultural symptoms are there to be recognized, but to carry them to their logical political conclusion is to be brought up short with the realization that it is not quite fair to document a political accusation with only emotional evidence. One can be grateful, then, for a book like "The Choice" which itself makes the indicated connection, which itself uses the word fascism and indeed takes its hero to Italy and into close, approving contact with Italian Fascist leaders. For all his bias, Mr. Mills is a more than usually thoughtful person who knows the relation between the emotional tone of a society and its government; he understands that, at least in our present-day world, personal and group frustrations almost inevitably seek an outlet in politics.

The outline of Mr. Mills's narrative is simple; the complexity of his novel—when it isn't merely the complexity of over-strained language—is the internal complexity of his protagonist. David Lennox is the last aristocrat of Georgia; the beautiful pre-Civil War house in which he spends his earliest years becomes his symbol of the traditional way of life which has given place, throughout the South, to Yankee vulgarity. The best of contemporary Southern society is little better than its worst; in association with his peers, David finds himself lonely as an exiled king. Indeed, although he is an artist—he loves music and becomes a writer—even David's adolescent sensitivity is the sensitivity not of the artist but of the young prince. Eventually, like his father before him and like his cousin George, a cruel, arrogant youth to whom he is exaggeratedly attached, he looks to Europe for a continuation of the old tradition and in Europe finds fascism, cure for the weakness of the defeated South.

And of course not the least interesting part of the story is that, having discovered fascism, David, unlike Cousin George, goes on to reject it in favor of religion. This is on page 400 of a 424-page book. He had always been a Catholic, but, too much given to the search for other solutions, he had neglected the solution of religion. The choice, however, of Mr. Mills's title is the choice between fascism and Catholicism; as David finally (and this time not spinning words) puts it: "Either God rules or I am a fool not to place myself with the men who rule." George chooses fascism, but although David has been right with him, among the men who rule, until the last twenty-four pages, before the book ends he makes a quick switch from Mussolini to the church. Well, twenty-four pages seem to me pretty small space for a personal revolution of any profundity; they look to me like just enough space to apply a new complexion to an old face—although I can scarcely believe that Mr. Mills intended his novel to prove so close an affinity between Catholicism and fascism. At any rate, "The Choice" is well worth study as a document of Southern reaction and quite despite the fact that David Lennox fancies himself to be so much alone.

If I had come to another Georgia document, Erskine Caldwell's "Georgia Boy" (Duell, Sloan, and Pearce, $2) after Mr. Mills's novel, no doubt, in contrast to the Southern aristocracy, I should have welcomed Mr. Caldwell's poor white trash as a breath of clean air. But unfortunately I read the Caldwell stories first and noted them—I fear a bit drearily—as an innocuous collection of extended anecdotes.

"The Last of Summer" by Kate O'Brien (Doubleday, Doran, $2.50) is the story of a young half-French actress who comes to visit her father's people in provincial Ireland and stays to win the eldest son, and then to lose him to his mother. I think it has been praised unduly, possibly because it is sufficiently underwritten to promise that still waters are running deep. Actually it is no more than a quiet, workman-like little novel.

IN BRIEF

MANPOWER FOR VICTORY. By John J. Corson. Farrar and Rinehart. $3.

This book is valuable as the first really complete treatment of the man-power problem. Written by the former director of the United States Employment Service, it provides a new awareness of the complexity of the man-power situation and the multitude of measures adopted by the government in dealing with that situation. The author has no panacea to offer. In general, the book may be considered a defense of the voluntary policies of the War Manpower Commission, but though it points out the difficulties of a compulsory program it does not deny that such a program may eventually be necessary.

LOT'S WIFE. By Max Eastman. Harper and Brothers. $2.

"Pride does tell me I can sing," observes Mr. Eastman in the prefatory verses to "Lot's Wife"; he would do well to cultivate humility. The virtue of intelligibility, which Mr. Eastman praises, not deep, but loud, has this slight disadvantage; it keeps a man from being given the benefit of the doubt. "Lot's Wife" is a vulgar performance; perhaps a little too erudite in some of its allusions, it is otherwise entirely suitable for the pages of Hearst's Sunday American.

ICELANDIC POEMS AND STORIES. Edited by Richard Beck. Princeton University Press. $3.

Iceland has had a literature for ten centuries, ever since Queen Aud, widow of Olaf the White, King of Dublin, went there around the year 890. (There was also a bard known as Audunn of Westfirth, in the eleventh century.) The American-Scandinavian foundation, through the medium of the Princeton University Press, has brought the record up to date with this collection of the work of the last century, starting with Bjarni Thorarensen, who died in 1841, and ending with Halldór Laxness, born in 1902. In his introduction Professor Beck points out that recent Icelandic literature has been affected both by the importation of romanticism from abroad and by a renewed interest in the native tradition: so far as one can judge from the works here translated, the native, or plain, material is more interesting than the fancy, or thrilled-to-the-soul, kind of thing. It is interesting to note that among the translators, Vilhjalmur Stefansson, who has some other claims to distinction, writes English of considerable force and directness; and it is curious that, while Professor Beck in his commentary on the various authors often refers to a gamy and ribald satirical tendency and to heretical social views, very little such work is found in the text proper.

THE LIFE OF JOHNNY REB: THE COMMON SOLDIER OF THE CONFEDERACY. By Bell Irvin Wiley. Bobbs-Merrill. $3.75.

The author of this monumental piece of research is professor of history at the University of Mississippi. He has extracted the ore from thousands of diaries, letters, newspapers, and official documents and arranged the material in topical chapters, illustrated by interesting contemporary photographs and drawings. It is a valuable work, of much poignant historical and human interest; but it is primarily for students of the Civil War. For the average reader of history a little of this goes a long way. For serious historians it admirably fills a gap.

SIBERIA. By Emil Lengyel. Random House. $3.75.

As in "The Danube," "Turkey," and "Dakar," Mr. Lengyel combines history, geography, politics, and personal impressions into a fascinating picture. The transformation of Siberia by the Soviets from a place synonymous with desolation to a flourishing region is brought out as it has not been before for the general reader. Its tremendous importance may be judged from the fact that in Siberia Russia borders on Iran, India, and China, comes into almost direct contact with Japan, and extends to within less than forty miles of Alaska, thus being by far the greatest Far Eastern power. Illustrated with photographs, clear end-paper maps, and a dramatic double title-page.

CAN WE WIN THE PEACE? By Paul Einzig. The Macmillan Company. $2.

It is the thesis of this closely argued little book that we can win the peace only if we insure the economic as well as the military disarmament of Germany. He shows how failure to do this was the principal defect of Versailles and after, and indicates how it might be done without reducing the German people to poverty.

ART

ZADKINE. At the Valentine Gallery. 55 East Fifty-seventh Street, until May 22.

Zadkine is a lyric artist of a bad period, the early twenties. His more academic works, especially "Tattooed Dreamer," have enough excellence to support his sentimentality. Most of the one-faced ladies toying with guitars are too like the most expensive French liners, when Lalique was in flower.

HELEN RATKAI. At the Gallery of Modern Art, 18 East Fifty-seventh Street, until May 22.

Miss Ratkai allows sex to guide her choice of subject, and, alas, to cloud her judgment. She has a very pretty line in her drawings, but cannot yet quite manage paint. There is nothing meretricious about her pictures; they are just not as strong as her emotions.

ABRAHAM RATTNER. Paul Rosenberg and Company, 16 East Fifty-seventh Street, until May 29.

Mr. Rattner is a special person. His reputation is high and it is hard to dispute it. All the same it is inflated. His pictures so dazzle one's eyes that it is difficult to realize that they are not as good as they seem. They are like stained-glass windows by a Jewish Picasso. But there is something stale about them, in spite of the brightness of their colors; two of them, "The Sun" and "April Showers," come off—and perhaps "Montauk Point"—but the others look as if he were trying to live up to an idea of himself, an idea shared by others whom he wants to please. He shouldn't be quite so slick. JEAN CONNOLLY

THE sort of thing which is immediately labeled "a fine idea for a play" almost never really is for a reason which ought to be obvious enough. Nine times out of ten such "fine ideas" are actually only anecdotes, and the finest of anecdotes is fine only for a sixty-second telling, not in a version which lasts two hours and a half. It sounds like a fine idea for a play just because the point can be made clear in a few words, and that means of course that the anecdote is probably not susceptible of any further development. Voltaire's brief summary of the plot of "Hamlet" makes it seem like one of the worst ideas for a play ever conceived by a man in his right senses, but that "Hamlet" is really a very fine play is generally admitted except by the kind of people who will persist in believing that "Sons and Soldiers" (Morosco Theater) must be good because it is so easy to tell your friends what it is about.

Irwin Shaw, author of this last-named piece, used a pretty good anecdote with disappointing results in his first play, "Bury the Dead"; he used another anecdote with equally disappointing results in his second, "The Gentle People"; and now, in "Sons and Soldiers," he tries to make a play out of something which is really rather less than an anecdote since it is actually hardly more than the idea for a narrative trick. Since Mr. Shaw is well known for his short short-stories it is perhaps not surprising that he should fail to realize how much material is needed for a full-length play; but Max Reinhardt, who has directed "Sons and Soldiers" with what looks like genuine if misplaced enthusiasm, and Bel Geddes, who designed the sets, might have been expected to know better.

The "idea" is simply this: In 1916 a young wife carrying a baby is told by her husband and her doctor that she has only one chance in ten to live if she ever gives birth and is therefore urged to go at once to the hospital for an abortion. Under the shock of the revelation she faints, and in her faint she not only dreams that the son is born but also that she can follow his career through the troubles of childhood and adolescence up to the day when he departs (as a pilot of course) to serve in the present war, which she prophetically sees coming. By the end of the second act she has concluded that for such a life as his it is not worth while for anyone to be born. By the end of the third she knows that to have been, as her son was, really alive is enough. She comes out of the faint and tells her husband that she is determined to take her long-odds gamble with death.

Now it ought to be obvious that such a framework around a story has only a very minor contribution to make to the effectiveness of the story itself and that the play about the young man's life will be neither significantly better nor significantly worse than it would have been if it had been told straightforwardly merely as the story of one man's life. If Mr. Shaw had been able to write a good play about a young man it would be a good play in this setting or in none at all; since he has not been able to write a play which is not most of the time hackneyed and unconvincing it still remains just that. There is, to be sure, a single scene—that of the fight with the mysterious bruiser on the campus—which has precisely the grotesque brutality of some of Mr. Shaw's short stories, and though I found it unsatisfying and unpleasant it has at least some individual character. Nearly all the rest seems to me no different from what any qualified script-writer would turn out on order, and it is probably some half-realization of this fact which has led Mr. Reinhardt to over-direct so violently and the actors to grow almost hysterical in their efforts to make the whole thing seem "strong." Gregory Peck as the son probably sins least, for he does his best to suggest the flannel-shirted, post-depression, socially-conscious sort of manliness which the author certainly had in mind. Geraldine Fitzgerald plays the mother with a combination of hysteria and careful voice production which I happened to find especially trying. As the bad woman who gets the hero's maidenhead, Stella Adler labors under various difficulties, not the least of which is one of the ham-miest speeches in modern dramatic literature—namely, the one about how she is always seeking and never finding a lover who can give her she knows not what.

During the first half-hour or so of the proceedings I suffered that agony which comes when one knows that one is reminded of something but cannot make the connection. Where had I heard before this hysterical intensity attempting to make the commonplace and the factitious sound tense and dramatic; where had I heard these speeches which aspired to be passionate and came out only as a sort of fretful whine? Presently I began to wait impatiently for the thing to be over and the news bulletin to come on. Then of course I knew where I was. Mr. Shaw, a "new" writer remotely related to Hemingway, had through some curious combination of circumstances, been led to produce a perfect soap opera. Most of the incidents could be cleaned up a bit and put directly on the air. Any number of the same general sort could be added, and the thing might go on for years and years. "What does Andrew's mother plan to say when she visits the woman who is stealing her son? Will he finally realize that the unselfish love of the

AT THE Duke Ellington concert in Carnegie Hall a couple of months ago someone was overheard to say: "The trouble with tonight's concert is that sophistication has reared its ugly head." I would say the trouble was pretentiousness as well as sophistication, and that they had reared their heads long before this concert. One can hear this in the performances reissued by Victor in "A Duke Ellington Panorama" (Set P-138, $2.63): the 1927 "East St. Louis Toodle-oo" and 1928 "The Mooche" (20-1531), the 1930 "Ring dem Bells" and "Mood Indigo" (20-1532), the 1934 "Stompy Jones" and "Delta Serenade" (20-1533), the 1940 "Dusk" and "Warm Valley" (20-1534). The 1927 and 1928 performances were recorded by an orchestra of ten, the 1930 performances by an orchestra of twelve; and though the arranged ensembles and backgrounds are skilfully contrived they are quite simple in style and in harmony, they leave plenty of room for the soloists to play with freedom and at length, and the entire performances have the relaxed freedom and vitality of jazz performance. By 1934 Ellington had expanded his orchestra and had been talked into thinking of himself as an American composer; and in the performances of that year one hears already the harmonically lush and stylistically luxuriant arrangements which envelop and hold down the players' imaginations and rob the entire performance of spontaneity and vigor. The 1934 and 1940 performances in this volume I find undeniable; of the early ones "East St. Louis Toodle-oo" is very fine, "Ring dem Bells" is not far behind, "The Mooche" is only fair, and everything in "Mood Indigo" is good (chiefly a superb clarinet solo) outside of the well-known theme of the piece.

Decca's first volume of reissues in its Brunswick Collectors' Series, "Ellingtonia—Volume I" (Set B-1000, $3.68), offers only early Ellington performances: the 1927 "East St. Louis Toodle-oo" and "Birmingham Breakdown" (80-000), the 1931 "Rockin' in Rhythm" and "Twelfth Street Rag" (80,001), the 1927 "Black and Tan Fantasy" and 1928 "The Mooche" (80,002), the 1930 "Mood Indigo" and 1929 "Wall Street Walk" (80,003). The "East St. Louis," "Mooche," and "Mood Indigo" performances are of course quite different from the ones in the Victor set: the Brunswick "East St. Louis" is lighter-footed, brighter, and more spirited, and I like it better; so with the Brunswick "Mooche"; and while the clarinet solo in the Brunswick "Mood Indigo" does not equal the one in the Victor performance, it is good, it is supported by an excitingly powerful string bass, and there is also a good trumpet solo which leaves less room for the theme. As for the others, "Wall Street Walk" is superb, "Twelfth Street Rag" is good, "Rockin' in Rhythm" is fair, "Birmingham Breakdown" is quite bad, and the "Black and Tan Fantasy" is not as good as the one on Victor 24,486, and is noisy enough to have been dubbed from an old record.

If I had to choose between the two volumes I would take the Brunswick; and if I could not have the entire volume I would choose 80,000 and 80,003. And, as in the case of Haydn and Beethoven, I would listen without reading: just why these jazz reissues must be accompanied by the pretentious confusion, inaccuracy, and sheer illiteracy of the people who write about jazz, I don't know. Listen without reading, and you will know that you are hearing a tuba, not a string bass, and a string bass, not a tuba.

Ellington's Carnegie Hall concert was not the horror that the New Masses "Spirituals to Jazz" affair was a couple of years ago; but it was bad enough. There were this time not a dozen vaudeville acts constantly pushing each other on and off and around the stage, but only one orchestra dressed up and put through tricks like a trained-monkey act; there was this time only the professional master-of-ceremonies glibness of Ellington himself; and there was only the one gilt-and-plush luxuriance in which even the early "Black and Tan Fantasy" and "Rockin' in Rhythm" were now enveloped, and by which the soloists were strangled, except for a few moments like the one near the end when Lawrence Brown freshened the atmosphere with a freely-moving hot trombone solo. But it was hard to take for a whole evening; and hardest of all was the forty-five-minute stretch of "Black, Brown, and Beige," described as "a tone parallel to the history of the Negro in America," and based on the idea that since the American Negro had produced a distinctive music called jazz, jazz was the medium in which to express in musical terms everything that had happened to the American Negro, from his being brought here in slavery to the fact that today, as Ellington put it, "the black, brown, and beige is right in there with the red, white, and blue." Actually the work had no evident relation to the history of the Negro in America; and taken for itself it was the product of a man attempting large-scale thought and construction with powers adequate for the four minutes of "Lazy Rhapsody"—which is to say that it was an unintegrated succession of one thing after another for forty-five minutes.

"Billy the Kid" continues to be given by the Ballet Theater without Eugene Loring, and to lose by that fact. Michael Kidd is an even less adequate substitute in the title role than Ian Gibson, since he dances with less technical assurance and brilliance; and detail continues to crumble away. But it remains a superb piece, which should not be missed. On the other hand Markova's dancing in "Lilac Garden" is so beautiful that one is less aware of Tudor's repetitiousness; and I think the meaning which her authority and maturity of style give to the part—as against the impression of youthfulness conveyed by Annabelle Lyon—is a right one.

Letters to the Editors

Mr. Fraser and the Land Question

Dear Sirs: Can you endure another letter on the history quiz?

For all that Mr. Hugh Russell Fraser exploits only the simplest and most obvious aspects of American history in his current crusade against progressive educators, he has nevertheless succeeded in making at least one serious error—an interesting error because it seems to grow directly out of his vaunted worship of the pure "facts" and his disdain for interpretative accounts. There are no such things as the "facts of history" except as they are sorted and shaped into some pattern by historians, who usually have a bias; and we have learned that many things which once passed for gospel because they suited current prejudices or propagandistic needs will not stand the scrutiny of investigation.

Writing about his "quiz," Mr. Fraser says that the Homestead Act of 1862 was "the successful climax" of a thirty-year struggle against speculation in the public lands, that it gave to "millions" the right to "stake their own claim in public lands," and that but for the people's absorption in the war it "would have been the occasion of a great nation-wide celebration." Such is the traditional historical legend. The facts are otherwise. The noteworthy researches of such modern investigators as Professor Paul Gates have convinced all informed students that the Homestead Act did not end speculation in lands, did not satisfy the settlers' cry for land, and did not, except for the very brief period, arouse the western farmer's jubilation. If anyone "celebrated," it was the moneyed speculators of Wall Street. Mr. Fraser is correct in his statement that the land question constitutes an important chapter in American history; he is quite wrong in his version of that importance.

Mr. Fraser's logic, by which he seeks to lay the blame for collegians' ignorance of history on "social studies," is strange enough to require no refutation. He is obviously, as Mr. Stone suggested in The Nation, pleading somebody's special cause, which destroys his case. Yet I think there is a grain of truth in what he says—the fact of the matter is that we need facts plus broad interpretations. There is as little excuse for loose generalization in the teaching and writing of history as there is for myopic recitals of barren facts. What we need—and are only just beginning to get—is the kind of approach that combines with the strictest research standards a high critical intelligence and the capacity for interpretation. It so happens that Gates's work on the western land question is an outstanding example of this; that Mr. Fraser should be unaware of it is thus doubly damning. One wonders if he himself, along with the Times, is really qualified to pass judgment on our knowledge of American history.

Spare the Taxpayer— and Spoil the Currency

Dear Sirs: The President, in his January budget message, requested $16 billions of new taxes for the fiscal year beginning in July. The Carlson Bill, besides reducing the victory tax, would have cancelled $10 billions of taxes already levied against 1942 incomes. The Doughton Bill would have lowered the victory tax, while imposing no increases whatever. The projected compromise bill evidently would lower the Victory Tax and cancel $4-$5 billions of 1942 taxes. Repealing the inadequate increases of the 1942 Act, it would also prevent any further increase of taxes against 1943 incomes.

All this is sheer fiscal insanity—financially irresponsible government. To control or to retard inflation, we need, not a mere $16 billions of new tax levies but $30-$40 billions (i.e., total taxes of $65-$75 billions)—as even casual examination of income estimates will clearly show.

After four long months, Congress seems now prepared to compromise on a reduction of $6 billions! And this compromise is blessed with the indorsement of Secretary Morgenthau!

The proper and urgent application of "pay-as-you-go" is in war finance, not in the misguided Ruml plan. We must have current, advance, at-source collection of the basic income tax on wages and salaries. For taxpayers' declarations and their residual, direct payments, however, the income tax should remain on a previous-year basis.

Congressmen scream about the intolerable burdens of partial double payment which at-source collection, in a simple program, would involve. Under any rates yet proposed, however, people with incomes below $10,000 or $20,000 would pay, against two years' income, less than they should pay, to check inflation, against one year's. And the large taxpayer would only be discharging accrued tax liability against which he must, with any prudence, otherwise set up reserves of cash or bonds.

I am now paying about 15 per cent as income tax. If the draft age had not been lowered, I would now be paying 70 per cent (counting army pay and perquisites). Why shouldn't my financial contribution be commensurate with the draftee's, and my dependents be burdened much like his? Don't tell me that I couldn't stand a 40 per cent basic rate (after my exemptions) or a 20 per cent rate with double collection!

But there is no escape. I can pay my share as income tax, whose burdens can be allocated deliberately and with some fairness among families; or I can pay it through inflation, which must involve utterly inequitable allocation.

The income tax must be the foundation of any sound anti-inflation program. Price ceilings, wage control, rationing, and non-bank borrowing are useful but relatively minor, complementary, stop-gap devices and cannot stand alone. Surplus purchasing power must be drained off; only severe income taxes can do the job.

I don't want to see our war bonds half repudiated by eventual doubling of the price level (which is a sanguine forecast of where present fiscal policy will lead). I don't want my retirement annuity or life insurance reduced in purchasing power by half or three-quarters. I don't want to live through the revolutions or political upheavals which uncontrolled inflation will involve. To avoid these things, I'll gladly pay half or more of my income as income tax, for the duration, if others pay correspondingly. And we'll almost all be better off than if we try to spend our increasing aggregate incomes on inexorably diminishing supplies of consumer goods and services.

The Administration has repudiated responsibilities of fiscal leadership. The Republicans, erstwhile champions of "sound finance," are fighting tax increases and plumping for inflation via Ruml-plan cancellations and reductions. Is there no leadership anywhere, among politicians or the press, to challenge those who, buying a few votes for 1944, would spare the taxpayer and spoil the currency?

Another View

Dear Sirs: In The Nation recently an article appeared by Selden Menefee, entitled Why They Follow Lewis. Since Mr. Menefee mentions the Hazard, Kentucky, coal fields, and since I happen to be personally interested financially and in a working way with operations in that field, I feel that Mr. Menefee wrote a great deal of this article from ignorance.

The social movement within the coal mining districts of Hazard, Kentucky, has been an upward one steadily since 1915. About that time the field was generally opened up. Prior to that time there had been an infiltration from "over the mountains" of settlers from elsewhere, but when they reached Hazard and stopped there they were without benefit of clergy, medicine, schools, etc.

To Mr. Menefee I would earnestly recommend that he read some of the books written by Miss Lucy Furman. Miss Lucy Furman established a school at Hindman, Kentucky. It still exists, and helps a great deal; and her book entitled "Quare Women" is most enlightening as to conditions in that field when the coal operators began to come in.

Today, with the advent of the railroads, the highways, the automobile, and steady work, the children are better fed, and they are well clothed; housing conditions are better, and general living conditions better than the miner ever expected to find it possible to obtain—and the whole countryside is changed and has been steadily changing for the better in the last twenty-five years.

Right now our biggest problem is absenteeism, Mr. Lewis (John L.) to the contrary notwithstanding. A survey of our Hazard field taken by our Association office in Hazard, Kentucky, revealed that the men are away from their work a great deal. They are making more money than they ever made before, and a great deal of it has been spent in the last few months for whiskey—more than in the past. They have had more—they have bought more, and it has created more absenteeism. Of course sickness does create some, and a desire to raise a garden, go fishing, and to do other things, is responsible in a measure; but we operators in the Hazard field are offering six days' work a week to our miners, and they are not taking advantage of it. At a mine in which I am interested, and which can load 42 to 44 cars every day, we loaded 19 cars on Saturday, due entirely to absenteeism. We would have been far better off not to have run at all that Saturday. We lost money giving work to the few that wanted work, but in good faith we gave work to those who wanted it.

Your magazine is supposed to be a fair paper. I rather suggest to you to look into the matter further than to let Mr. Menefee's article in The Nation stand as a full description. The people are entitled to the truth—by all means, give them the truth.

CALVIN HOLMES

Knoxville, Tenn., April 22

"Henry James Place"

Dear Sirs: By all means let us change Washington Place to "Henry James Place"; but let's forget Mr. Zabel's alternative suggestion of a simple "James Place" which would not honor the James family but simply give my old street the anonymity of Charles Street or Sullivan Street. That's what happened to the streets I lived on in Palo Alto a few years ago: it was hard to remember that the apartment was on Ralph Waldo Emerson Street and the later house on Walt Whitman Court when those names were shortened to a mere Emerson Street and Whitman Court. And had I been able to go to George Gordon, Lord Byron Street instead of the simpler Byron Street, how much more pleasant my dental visits would have been!

If it's possible to get La Guardia to change one street for Henry James, could we not make other changes as well? Perhaps not whole streets, but blocks or even half blocks—à la our former Vannest Place? The final block of Sullivan Street, between the Square and Third might be John Sloan Place—it is the street nearest his Hotel Judson studio; and the west side of MacDougall Street—could be Eugene O'Neill Place, in honor of the man whose great first works were launched there.

But enough of such sweet fantasy. Mr. Zabel knows it can't be done; Miss Marshall knows it can't be done; I know it can't be done. It is of such things, however, our dreams and hopes are made on—particularly while we struggle through our daily military routine. Who knows but that enough impossible dreams dreamed, enough impossible hopes hoped, some of our impossibles may become realities. All good luck.

A Pioneer Remembers

Dear Sirs: So Life compares food-rationed women of the United States with the famished inhabitants of Europe. Permit a pioneer of the great Midwest to tell how we lived in the '60s and '70s of the last century.

William Henry Harrison Fate, some generations American, pillar of a Methodist country church, four times County Superintendent of Schools in Union County, Dakota Territory, ate his first meal in that Territory in 1862, at the home of another pioneer, Thomas Watson from Missouri, and the menu was baked squash and salt with water as a beverage. He lived to an advanced age.

A shrub grew on the high hills bordering the valley of the Big Sioux River; it had clusters of small white flowers and deeply veined leaves which, I was informed, were used by the first comers for making tea. A legume, perennial, low-spreading, had seed pods that were quite large, round, and fleshy; I was told some of the pioneers used them for "sausage," cooked and sweetened. A usual custom was to butcher pork in the fall; by spring it was consumed and eggs, milk, butter, and vegetables wintered over supplied the table till young chickens came on.

Plenty of game, of course, in spring and fall, but farmers had little time for hunting during those busy seasons. Fish was plentiful for those near water courses.

In his "Giants in the Earth" Rolvaag tells of pioneers who ate badgers; I knew families who ate the gray gophers or ground squirrels, also muskrats. These were all country people, living chiefly off their own products.

As to education, I should know something of that as I began teaching our district school of a few small children in the '70s. Called back into school work by a shortage of teachers years later, I served as County Superintendent at the time of the first World War. I have been for some years astonished at the ignorance of the masses in view of the uncountable sums spent on education since the beginning of educational work in our country. I charge it to the universal employment of young girls as instructors—"high school kids" with a year or two of normal training.

Years ago it was stated that the average teaching life of these girls was three years; how much experience could be acquired in that length of time? Young men seemed to take rural teaching for a year or two as a stepping stone to some higher career. The need is for professional teachers of broad mentality, and the best for the primary grades, just as laying the foundation is the most important part of building.

We have college professors sadly lacking in breadth of view; like the one who came to fill a country pulpit who warned against Communists and informed the natives that Kulaks were a tribe.

Judge Lindsay

Dear Sirs: One of the highlights of a trip to the Pacific Coast from which I have just returned was a lunch with Judge Ben Lindsay and his wife, and it was therefore with acute sadness that I learned of his recent death. I was impressed by his youth and faith and energy. Apparently, his trust in youth kept him young, his numerous contacts with plain, decent people gave him faith in humanity, and his awareness of how much there was to be done to correct this world's affairs endowed him with the energy to go ahead trying to correct them. I urged him to write his autobiography as a testament from which his successors in the fight for justice might learn, but he apparently preferred to continue the fight rather than write about it. He was full of plans. He talked with zest of how he settled complicated family problems by stepping down from the judge's black pinnacle and dealing with men and women in terms of life rather than in terms of cold legal routine. He made enemies thereby, but they respected him. He made friends and they loved him. What a loss to America and to mankind!

LOUIS FISCHER

New York, May 5

On the Other Foot

Dear Sirs: Almost every news report by radio the past week-end has included a statement to the effect that Congress is "united behind the President in a firm stand against the strike of the coal miners." It is good to hear the words "united behind the President," but one can't help querying how it is that a divided Congress is able to unite in the opinion that, starving or not, needy or not, unfairly treated or not, the miners must put the war need first, when the same Congress defied the President—and that in a tricky manner that discredited our methods of government—when there was a question of limiting salaries to $25,000 per year for the period of war.

In my opinion any appeal for all-out-war sacrifice is bound to be scrutinized closely for some time to come by those whose sacrifice comes out of the family's food budget as long as they remember that cheap trick of our Representatives, on behalf of privilege.

The Shape of Things

REPORTS THAT KING VICTOR EMANUEL HAS abdicated or is about to do so should, we believe, be heavily discounted, although there is little doubt that Italy is experiencing a severe internal crisis. The re-emergence of generals who had been out of favor suggests that an attempt is being made by the army to disassociate itself from the Fascisti and force Mussolini to relinquish direct control of defense. Meanwhile the Duce is trying to restore the crumbling basis of his power by purging the Fascist Party leadership and appointing members of the Old Guard to key positions. But the party itself is sick. Its numbers have been declining rapidly—a sign that membership is coming to be regarded as a liability instead of the essential foundation of any kind of career. Under these circumstances the problem of Italy becomes for the Allies as much political as military. And therein lies a danger. We may have offers not from one Darlan but a dozen—representatives of various interests which have supported Mussolini for twenty years but are now getting ready to abandon a sinking ship. We cannot afford to give patronage to any group or personality discredited with the Italian people; and that includes the royal family. For while it is not our business to depose Victor Emanuel, it is even less our business to prop him up. Recent reports have suggested that as and when we defeat the various Axis powers we shall deal only with the military authorities and only on the basis of unconditional surrender. We hope that this is indeed the policy which will be followed in Italy; any attempt to negotiate with self-appointed groups must involve the continuation of fascism under a new guise.

TWO MONTHS AGO BLAIR BOLLES WROTE IN The Nation that if Washington gives President Benes a good reception, "it will mean that the United States government is approaching a decision in favor of friendship with Russia." If Mr. Bolles's thesis is sound—and we believe it is—then we are indeed edging toward a closer collaboration with the Soviets, because the reception to the President of Czecho-Slovakia leaves nothing to be desired in the way of cordiality. He has been entertained at the White House, addressed Congress, and witnessed the elevation of his country's diplomatic mission to the status of an embassy. These attentions, the sweeter we hope for being so long overdue, are the more striking in view of Dr. Benes's prospective visit to Moscow. Traditionally close to the Anglo-American-French democracies, Benes has come in the past year to appreciate the indispensability of friendly Russian participation in a stable Europe. He is thus peculiarly fitted for the role of liaison in the vital task of clearing away the suspicions which still tend to keep the Soviet Union at arm's length from its allies. As a corollary to friendlier relations with the Russians, the Benes visit heralds an end to flirtations with those who, like Otto Hapsburg, Eckhardt, and Hodza, have been fostering here the dream of a cordon sanitaire. A strong Czecho-Slovakia has always been a nightmare to these individuals, and it is good to see that nightmare taking on the flesh of reality.

WE CAN'T GET AS EXCITED ABOUT THE reciprocal-trade-treaty program as Cordell Hull—he calls it "the central and indispensable point in any feasible program of international cooperation"—but we find much to cheer about in the resounding decision of the House of Representatives to extend the program. In the first place, the vote is an astonishing tribute to a scheme that has proved its soundness and a recognition that international trade cannot be a one-way affair. When the trade pacts were first proposed in 1934, only 2 Republican Congressmen out of a total of 101 dared to support this challenge to the high protective tariff and the belief in economic isolationism. Six years later the scheme attracted only 5 Republicans out of 161. Last week 145 Republicans, including Hamilton Fish, voted aye to 52 against, and even the G. O. P. National Chairman, Harrison E. Spangler, was quoted on the floor in support of the measure. The vote does not necessarily herald a peace based on genuine international cooperation, but it is a hopeful move all the same. Just how hopeful may be gauged by imagining the sour effect which defeat of the scheme, or even a close vote, would have had throughout the world. Almost equally refreshing is the sight of the Republican delegation split on a matter of principle instead of solid as a matter of politics.

TO ANYONE FAMILIAR WITH THE CAREER and personality of Dr. Robert Morss Lovett, the suggestion that he "harbors subversive sympathies" seems too ridiculous to deserve comment. Yet that charge has not only been made against him in all seriousness by the Dies Committee for the Assassination of Character; it has been "checked" and found valid by the Kerr Committee for Compounding Dies's Crimes; and finally it has been accepted by the House Appropriations Committee as a contributing reason for dismissing Dr. Lovett as Lieutenant Governor of the Virgin Islands through the device of eliminating the post. The one bright spot in this nasty affair is that Harold L. Ickes happens to be Dr. Lovett's boss; and the action of the committee is not likely to diminish the wholly justified rage with which the Curmudgeon last week greeted the Kerr committee's slanderous and idiotic "findings." Mr. Ickes issued a vigorous defense of Dr. Lovett, whom he has known for forty-five years, and denounced the committee for resorting to the "type of liquidation that is offered in conquered European nations." We hope Mr. Ickes will succeed in keeping Dr. Lovett at his post. Meanwhile we suggest that Americans of all opinions ponder the charges made against Dr. Lovett. As evidence of his "subversive sympathies" the Kerr committee cited among other things the fact that he had once voted for Norman Thomas, that he had been an editor of the New Republic, and that he had been affiliated with the American Civil Liberties Union and the American Birth Control League. The witch-hunt of the Dies and Kerr committees is moving rapidly into the A. Mitchell Palmer phase, in which subversive is a synonym for liberal.

AN ALL-OUT BLAST AT SOCIAL SECURITY, written by Gerhard Hirschfeld, "research director" of the Insurance Economics Society of America, which just appeared in Barron's, is being given wide circulation by unknown sponsors. Mr. Hirschfeld charges that a Beveridge plan for America, giving the same security that is provided by the British plan, would cost us some $15 billion a year. This is an interesting calculation, coming from the source it does, because what Mr. Hirschfeld is saying, without in the least intending to, is that the United States falls short by some $15 billion of providing the everyday subsistence needs of its population. For all that the Beveridge plan pretends to do for England is to meet these minimum needs. Its scale of benefits is often low by American standards. The difference between Beveridge's proposals and our present social-security system lies chiefly in the fact that the Beveridge plan attempts to meet all types of insecurity on the same basis, while ours has many serious gaps. Mr. Hirschfeld admits that an annual burden of $15 billion might not be excessive for a national income of $100 billion or more if it were borne by salary- and wage-earners, but he finds, to his great chagrin, that these groups probably cannot carry more than one-fourth of the burden and that the rest will fall on the "upper middle class and the well-to-do." That simply can't be tolerated!

OUR CRITICISMS OF DOLLAR-A-YEAR MEN have appeared unduly harsh to some of our readers. But after reading the remarks of that Grand Old Republic can William Allen White on their activities we feel like editorial Milquetoasts. In a pungent comment in the Emporia Gazette, Mr. White, whose recent illness has happily left his vigor unabated, described the two wars in Washington—the foreign war and the domestic war. "The domestic war front," he wrote, "is in the various war boards. . . . Here in Washington every industry is interested in saving its own self. It wants to come out of the war with a whole hide and with its organization unimpaired, legally or illegally. One is surprised to find men representing great commodity trusts or agreements or syndicates planted in the various war boards. It is silly to say New Dealers run this show. It's run largely by absentee owners of amalgamated industrial wealth. . . . For the most part these managerial magnates are decent, patriotic Americans. They have great talents. If you touch them in nine relations of life out of ten, they are kindly, courteous Christian gentlemen. But in the tenth relation, where it touches their own organization, they are stark mad, ruthless, unchecked by God or man, paranoiacs, in fact, as evil in their design as Hitler."

IN DISCUSSIONS OF HOW TO GET AID TO China with the Burma road closed, too little attention has been paid to the unique possibilities of the Chinese Industrial Cooperatives. These cooperatives have demonstrated their ability, with a minimum of outside assistance, to make a large part of the war supplies needed in China with local labor and materials. They have shown that they can get into production within a few weeks and that they can continue production under front-line conditions. There are at present in China some hundreds of thousands of refugees from the Japanese-occupied famine areas who could be organized for cooperative production with a very limited amount of technical and material aid from the United States. China's remarkable success with industrial cooperatives suggests also a technique for post-war reconstruction which might be fully as applicable in Europe as in Asia.

THE TENTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE TVA ON May 18 finds the once stormy petrel of domestic politics generally accepted as a valuable asset to the nation's defenses. Its thirteen completed dams, harnessing the tremendous energy of the Tennessee River and its tributaries, have made possible a huge industrial expansion for the war program. They have also provided some six hundred miles of navigable waterways to relieve our overburdened transportation system. But most significant of all has been the conversion of the TVA's phosphatic fertilizer plant, around which its soil-rehabilitation program revolved, to the production of badly needed phosphates for munitions. The TVA's steady growth in productivity is worthy of more attention than it has received. Starting in 1933 with a production of 15,688 kilowatt-hours, its power output rose to 1,733,000,000 kilowatt-hours in 1939 and is expected to reach 9,100,000,000 this year. During the same period river traffic has risen from 32,658,000 to 161,469,000 ton-miles. While these figures indicate the extent to which the TVA has justified itself in time of war, its greatest contribution to American life does not appear in statistical tables. Its educational, health, and agricultural-rehabilitation projects have made a contribution not only to America, in terms of better citizens, but to the world in suggesting a technique capable of being applied in many of the most backward areas of the earth. Special honor is due at this time to ex-Senator Norris, who more than any dozen other men is responsible for the TVA and its achievements.

Fiscal Conjuring

A MORE or less unadulterated version of the Ruml plan has been voted by the Senate and may well have received the indorsement of the House by the time this issue of The Nation is published. But the bill will still need the President's signature, and in a letter addressed to Senator George and Representative Doughton Mr. Roosevelt has hinted strongly that his veto power will be exercised. Mr. Roosevelt makes it clear that he favors the withholding section of the bill, which provides for a much-needed improvement in the mechanism of tax collection. And realizing that the transition may work hardship on those groups whose tax rates are likely to be drastically increased this year—the lower and middle brackets—he is prepared to approve "substantial adjustments." But he evidently considers total abatement of 1942 taxes too high a price to pay for the admitted benefits of withholding.

It has always been argued by the Ruml clique that the two sections must go together, that if withholding were introduced without forgiving 1942 taxes and putting everyone on a "current" basis, it would mean a double burden on taxpayers this year which they could not shoulder. Actually it would be perfectly possible to devise a method of withholding taxes at the source of income without inflicting such a double burden, as Jerome Weinstein showed in these pages on February 20, and the Treasury, we believe, has been negligent in not exploring this avenue. The Rumlites were, of course, not interested, since withholding—not included in the original Ruml plan—has been for them not an end in itself but simply a means of putting over the greatest raid on the public purse in history.

The essence of the Ruml plan is fiscal conjuring. We have been told ad nauseam that no "forgiveness" is really involved and that it is possible, at one and the same time, for taxpayers to be saved $10 billion while the Treasury loses nothing. The greater part of the press has attested so long and unanimously to the authenticity of this miracle that the editorial writers have convinced most people, including themselves. Indeed, we have even been assured that so far from losing anything the Treasury will actually increase its receipts. A few old-fashioned folk remained skeptical. One of them, Senator Connally of Texas—in a speech barely mentioned in the New York Times and Herald Tribune—insisted stoutly, "If the taxpayer pays taxes on 1942 and 1943 income the government gets two years' taxes. If he pays only 1943 taxes, the government will never get 1942 taxes. Bring in all your professors, and if they can demonstrate that if a man keeps $600,000 in his pocket the government is not worse off, I'll withdraw these remarks. Santa Claus is here. You are giving a man with a million-dollar income $854,000 in order to get his chauffeur on a current basis."

Santa Claus is here indeed, and though it may be blasphemy to say so, he is as usual distributing his gifts in direct proportion to the income of the households which he visits. In fact, we shall not be surprised if it turns out that he has been taking from the poor to give to the rich. For after Congress finally stops talking about how taxes should be paid, it must get down to the question of what should be paid.

Although the United States is the wealthiest country in the world, it is today meeting a smaller proportion of its war costs and receiving from taxes a smaller proportion of national income than any other belligerent. There is an urgent need of more revenue, and the Treasury has asked, and will ask again, for an additional $16 billion. If this sum is levied by income tax it will mean raising the rates so as to double the present yield. But on what classes will these increased rates mainly fall? Since it is not possible to double taxes in those brackets already paying more than 50 per cent, rates on incomes in the lower and middle brackets will have more than doubled. Thus the vast majority of taxpayers are likely to find that what they have gained on the Ruml swings they will lose, and more than lose, on the roundabouts of the next tax bill.

As Senator La Follette said in a speech opposing the Ruml plan, "Although the expedient of canceling 1942 tax liabilities has no significance so far as reducing the ultimate tax burden of the war, it is significant as a means of redistributing that burden at the expense of the lower and middle income groups. It is a foregone conclusion that the amounts forgiven each of the various income groups cannot, as a practical matter, be recovered from exactly the same groups through increased rates. The rates in the upper brackets cannot be raised substantially. Whether the increased burden takes the form of increased income-tax rates, compulsory savings, or consumption taxes, the middle- and lower-income taxpayers are going to foot the bill."

If this situation does not arise, it will only be because Congress, having made so handsome a gesture of forgiveness to the taxpayers as a whole, will funk the consequences of canceling it out so far as the lower brackets are concerned. And that will mean that the enactment of the Ruml plan will not only have deprived the Treasury of sorely needed revenues but will have frozen tax rates at a level far too low to meet the fiscal needs of the country and to check inflationary spending.

Will Hitler Abandon Mussolini?

HITHERTO it has always been assumed that however disillusioned and dispirited Italy might become, it could not revolt against the Axis or attempt to make a separate peace because it was completely under Hitler's thumb. Perhaps the number of German troops in the peninsula at any one time has been exaggerated, but there is little doubt that the Gestapo has been strategically posted throughout Italy, while the Luftwaffe has established numerous bases in Calabria, Sicily, and Sardinia. Germany's chief hold on its partner, however, has been economic. Without German coal, iron, and other materials Italy's industry cannot operate, and its services are completely dependent on the oil which Hitler allots to them from his own restricted supplies.

So it is correct to talk of Italy as a puppet state, powerless to act against the wishes of Berlin. The question that now arises, however, is whether Hitler can any longer afford to keep his thumb on Rome. That must be one of the most acute problems facing the Führer. If he is to continue to control Italy he must provide it with backbone. He must send troops, planes, guns, and raw materials. And with the Allies threatening to invade Sicily, and perhaps the mainland, in force, that may easily mean an unlimited investment. He has just expended fifteen divisions or so in a bid for time in Africa. How many more would be absorbed by a prolonged defense of the vulnerable Italian coastline?

On the other hand, Hitler has to face the prospect of Italy's rapid collapse should he abandon it to its own devices. The country is short of food and economically disorganized. Its people, exposed to terrific aerial bombardment, are clearly in no moral state to put up a desperate resistance. If it surrendered, the Alpine wall would still bar the Allies from an easy advance into Germany itself. But with the Allies in Italy the whole Nazi position in the Balkans would be outflanked. How tenable would Greece be under such circumstances? Would it be possible to resist a drive on the Aegean shores by the Ninth British Army, now in the Middle East? And if the Germans had to abandon Greece, could their retreat stop short of the Danube? Again, Allied occupation of northern Italy and Corsica would threaten the German forces in southern France. Would the hastily constructed coastal defenses of the Riviera then prove sufficient?

Clearly, a decision to cut his losses in Italy is not one that Hitler can make lightly. Nevertheless, there are indications that he is pulling out. From Stockholm come reports of peremptory demands by Mussolini for more anti-aircraft guns and planes. This seems credible in view of the pounding that southern Italy is now receiving and the notorious inadequacy of the Italian air force. Numerous stories from Berne speak of troop trains taking German soldiers and their equipment north while Italians move south. Another report says that a large part of the Italian army of laborers in Germany has been repatriated. News from these neutral centers must be treated with reserve, but the Rome radio hardly disguises the fact that the Italian government is in an extreme state of jitters. Further, four Italian generals, three of whom had earlier in the war been retired in semi-disgrace, have been given command of the Italian armed forces, and Marshal Badoglio, long at odds with Mussolini, has been called back to assume supreme command in the south. It is certain that if German troops were destined to play any considerable part in the defense of Italy they would not do so under an Italian commander.

Is Japan Next?

PRIME MINISTER CHURCHILL'S latest journey to Washington on the heels of the spectacular Tunisian victory has occasioned a welter of speculation regarding the possibilities of major offensive action in the Far East. The fact that Marshal Wavell, commander-in-chief in India, Admiral Somerville, commander of British naval forces in the Bay of Bengal, and Air Marshal Sir Richard Peirse accompanied Churchill and are presumably conferring with Lieutenant General Stilwell and Major General Chennault makes it evident that the Far East is being discussed.

The Tunisian victory carries at least as great potentialities for the East as it does for the West. In reopening the Mediterranean, the Allies cut by weeks the length of time needed to get supplies to India, and thus released hundreds of thousands of tons of shipping for use in a possible Far Eastern offensive. There is also a possibility that the British will be able to spare a portion of their Mediterranean fleet to support operations in the Indian Ocean. This possibility would become almost a certainty if the United Nations should succeed in destroying or immobilizing the Italian fleet within the next few months. The shifting of the powerful Mediterranean fleet to the East through Suez would open the way for a direct sea invasion of Burma and might even be the first step in an attempt to recapture the East Indies.

The effects of these favorable developments on Far Eastern strategy are doubtless being thoroughly explored at Washington. This does not mean that the decision to concentrate first on the defeat of Germany is being reconsidered. But within the framework of that decision there is considerable leeway for a shifting strategy of warfare against Japan. Many changes have occurred in the over-all picture since Roosevelt and Churchill first decided—a few weeks after Pearl Harbor—to place first emphasis on the European struggle. After two winter setbacks in Russia and a crushing defeat in North Africa, Germany does not appear nearly so formidable as it did in December, 1941. Japan, on the other hand, has greatly increased its potential strength by the conquest of the Philippines, Singapore, the East Indies, and Burma. Our great Far Eastern ally—China—has been all but completely cut off from the Western world and is finding difficulty in holding its own against new Japanese drives. Thus a greater relative emphasis on the Far East would seem to be called for.

The most important immediate objective of offensive action in the Pacific is obviously the reopening of the Burma supply line to China. This represents a considerably more ambitious undertaking than the United Nations were prepared for a year ago. Even the minor excursion into the Akyab area appears to have turned out badly, and the British forces that invaded western Burma have withdrawn into India. But the British now have an army of more than two million men in India, and with adequate naval support they might be able to land a strong force near Rangoon and thus avoid the necessity of slow, costly, mountain fighting. The American contribution to such an attack would presumably be chiefly in the air, although we might offer some naval aid.

It is quite possible, however, that the chief blow against Japan will come from another direction. The American landing on Attu suggests a greater use of the northern route to Tokyo. And there are many indications that our forces in China are being steadily strengthened. The existence of heavy American bombers in China has been revealed for the first time within the past fortnight. Preparations are reported to be under way for enlarging the port facilities of San Francisco to handle 100,000 men at a time instead of the present 50,000. Since only a few thousand men were involved in the fighting in Guadalcanal and New Guinea, it is evident that the Japanese are in for some surprises far transcending anything they have yet met. The main drive against Japan may wait, as Churchill declared earlier, upon the defeat of Hitler. But the Japanese had better not count too heavily on that. President Roosevelt's message to Chiang Kai-shek expressing "hope" that the Allied armies, in cooperation with the Chinese, would launch an offensive in Asia in "the very near future" seemed to reflect more than the usual diplomatic courtesy. The blow may not come next week, next month, or until after the monsoon season in Burma, but for the first time since Pearl Harbor there is reason to believe that the Far East is receiving nearly equal attention with Europe in the planning of Allied offensive strategy. That in itself is a matter for intense satisfaction.

To Shorten the War

THE report filed by the Kilgore committee, a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, is the ablest exposition we have yet encountered of the need for an over-all Office of War Mobilization. Although the problems of man-power, production, and economic stabilization grow ever more interdependent, the committee finds "little understanding" of this interdependence and no "mechanism to provide for policy decisions which concern all three aspects of the war-production effort." These findings are not based upon deduction, random inquiry, or surmise but upon executive sessions at which the committee questioned former Justice Byrnes of the Office of Economic Stabilization, Paul V. McNutt of the War Manpower Commission, and Charles E. Wilson, executive vice-chairman of the War Production Board, "The three witnesses," the committee says, "agreed that their three programs are interdependent and interrelated," "but each testified that policy decisions in his particular agency are confined to the limits of authority delegated to that agency, and that such decisions are reached by the individual agencies on a unilateral basis."

Testimony showed, for example, that war production was being expanded or cut back in individual plants without consultation with the War Manpower Commission. These developments became known to the commission only after they had taken place and in many cases only by accident. The poor results at Willow Run were discussed with the witnesses, who agreed that this specific problem involved questions of man-power, production, and economic stabilization, but here again the problem was treated purely as a WPB matter, "and no attempt has been made to reach a joint agreement on action needed." The committee finds a lack of coordination not only among these three agencies but within them. Of the Manpower Commission it reports that demands of war contractors "are merely being checked on a statistical basis. . . . There has been no practical control over the validity of demands by war contractors or to prevent hoarding, inefficient use of labor, unnecessary absenteeism, or labor idleness resulting from poor production methods and organization." The importance of such a check-up may be seen from the committee's observations in the field of aircraft. It says that while the program for 1943 calls for 750,000 additional workers, "it appears that existing and even higher production commitments could be met with one-half or one-third of the additional workers if steps were taken to obtain the most efficient utilization of man-power already on the job."

The Manpower Commission is not the only one of the three key agencies accused of slackness in its tasks. It says that while Wilson "is exerting very real pressure to improve inventory control and to improve scheduling of materials by the services," the WPB neither balances the fundamental elements of the production program nor acts "to assure the most efficient utilization of facilities, raw materials, and other resources." Likewise the committee criticizes Byrnes for failing, in most cases, to coordinate wage and price policies with man-power and production. One of the exceptions, praised by the committee, is his handling of the situation in non-ferrous metals. A large part of the credit goes to the International Mine, Mill, and Smelter Workers' Union, which has sought for more than two years to impress on the public the interrelationship of wage and man-power problems with production. The committee reports that 75 to 85 per cent of all wage cases before the War Labor Board represent requests by employers to raise wages so they can hold their labor force. It concludes that "if wages and prices had been administered as production and man-power instruments, stabilization of both the wage and price structure by industry-wide agreements, with incentive payments for increased production, would have become the basis for policy at an early stage."

The committee finds that as a result of this loose control of the basic factors of production we are behind schedule "in many important programs" and that several, including those for aircraft, tanks, and ordnance, have been "materially reduced." It sees the need for three remedies. One is the abolition of the cost-plus system, which leaves "no incentives for efficient use of facilities, labor, and materials." The second is the substitution of a total-war psychology for one of business as usual. "In almost every phase of the war effort we have continued to rely upon customary practices and relationships." The committee wants us to develop that "unified policy and operational structure which is the basis of competent organization in government as well as business." For this purpose it offers a new version of last year's Kilgore-Pepper-Tolan bill for an over-all War Mobilization Board and an Office of War Mobilization which would bring all factors—man-power, production, prices, and scientific resources—under the control of one central body. Sooner or later we shall be forced by circumstances to adopt some such measure. The sooner we do so the faster we shall increase the flow of material, and the speed of this, in turn, will determine the length of the war and the number of those who must fall on the battlefield before it ends.

My Plan à la Fischer

BY ELY CULBERTSON

I CONFESS to considerable difficulty in dealing with the article on my World Federation Plan by Louis Fischer in The Nation of April 24. Mr. Fischer did with the presentation of the plan what the good old monks used to do in copying the text of some author whose arguments they did not like or feared. By the time Fischer had finished with his subtle interpolations, his deft omissions, his watering down of the strong arguments and blowing up of the weaker ones, the God was gone from the text and only the shadow of Satan remained.

The result of Fischer's effort is a strange hybrid—Fischer's fulminating critique of the Culbertson plan à la Fischer.

The World Federation Plan is the result of many years of painstaking work. Louis Fischer did not do me the honor even to read the plan through. This will be apparent to anyone who compares my "Summary of the World Federation Plan" with Fischer's presentation of it in The Nation. By the time Fischer has offered his own inimitable version of the eleven Regional Federations which make up the World Federation, he has succeeded in painting a sinister picture of big, grasping, imperialistic nations exploiting the rest of the world. Then Mr. Fischer exclaims righteously, "What a nice mess all this will make!"

Indeed, Mr. Fischer, what a mess!

Fischer failed to mention anywhere that according to the plan large states will have much less control over the smaller sovereign states than they ever had before.

In fact, throughout his entire article Louis Fischer does not once mention the constitution of the World Federation; or the provisions for economic, educational, scientific, and other world-wide organizations within the World Federation; or the political and economic structure of the Regional Federations, so designed that they would serve as an indispensable, intermediate step toward the realization of the ideal of world citizenship and a free Cooperative of Nations.

tions and pronounces them "unrealistic." On the contrary, they are entirely realistic. I didn't create these regions as a God creating the earth in six days. They are there in flesh and blood. They already exist as geographic, economic, and psycho-social units—eleven big realities that stare one in the eyes. Look at the historical map of the world and notice how, through centuries and millenniums of history, the patterns of these eleven regions have twisted and shaped themselves. There is Malaysia with its 150,000,000 people of predominantly Malaysian stock. There are Japan, China, and India; there is the Islamic world from the Dardanelles to the Nile. Is Russia unrealistic? Or the western Slavs? Are the Germanic or Latin regions that grew out of the Holy Roman and ancient Roman empires figments of my imagination? To Louis Fischer the British Empire is a geographical absurdity. To me it is a historical, psycho-social, and economic reality. It is also a military reality.

It is all very well for my friend Fischer to preside at the liquidation of the British Empire at meetings in New York; but in London Churchill presides over the soon-to-be-victorious Britain. And he disagrees. And not only Churchill and the Tories; the great majority of the British people disagree. Behind the ugly façade of the British Empire we must not lose sight of the British Commonwealth of Nations, which is one of the most vital civilizing forces of today and tomorrow. Certainly, any feeling man is indignant over the many iniquities of British imperialism. And thinking men know that the British Empire is paved with good intentions. There is many a slip between the cup of freedom and the lip-service of the British Tories. But the friends of India cannot, for instance, achieve its independence by parading with placards on the streets of New York. An entirely different and more realistic approach is necessary.

Louis Fischer again waves his magic wand over the American Strategic Zone in my plan and proclaims it "imperialistic." He says, "Culbertson convicts himself," and as a bill of indictment proceeds to quote from my text of the Summary: "The establishment of the American Strategic Zone is a matter of vital necessity to the United States, and must be accomplished regardless of whether or not the World Federation is adopted." Then Mr. Fischer gleefully comments, "So there you have Culbertson, the great world reformer."

In the plan the American Strategic Zone consists of fortified bases running across and beyond the Western Hemisphere from Iceland to northern Thailand and Indo-China. The Latin American territories are excepted. These fortified bases will be held by the American contingent of the World Federation armed forces. They will be held on a long-lease basis by an arrangement similar to that now prevailing in Cuba or Bermuda, and until such time as the World Federation machinery is in full and secure operation. In all other respects the full sovereignty of every nation will be safeguarded, and it is further provided that all the undeveloped populations of the world shall be liberated.

Is this imperialism? If it is, then I am proud to be an imperialist.

Let us now assume that the World Federation does not come into existence, to Mr. Fischer's utter delight. In that event the odds will be heavily in favor of world power-politics prevailing over Fischer's welfare-politics; and it will be even more vital for our own security to occupy and maintain this chain of fortified centers.

If, in addition, we stop prattling about the Good Neighbor policy and turn to deeds, we can create a bloc of permanently allied nations containing 400,000,000 North Americans, Latin Americans, and Malaysians. This we can start doing at once by promulgating the Charter of the Pan-American Federation and establishing a regional council of strictly limited power, with a president, a regional supreme court to prohibit war and settle disputes, and a regional police force to enforce the prohibition of intra-regional wars. The 120,000,000 Latin Americans and the 130,000,000 North Americans would have equal representation in the regional government. Its formation would be the first decisive step toward a world based on a higher law. It would electrify the Latin Americans and the world by proving that we seek no political, economic, or ideological control over other nations and that we do renounce aggression not only in words but in deeds. The Malaysian Federation, also based on the essential sovereignty of constituent nations, can be organized after the defeat of Japan.

What does Louis Fischer propose to do with the Malaysian Region in the heart of the Pacific, surrounded by vastly populous, rapidly growing industrial powers—perhaps the seat of future Hitlers? Find a Malaysian Gandhi? When Mr. Fischer's seventy-odd simultaneous people's revolutions triumph, I shall have no objection to the withdrawal of the American troops from the American Strategic Zone. Until then we Americans must take elementary strategic precautions for the defense of the oceanic approaches to the American continent.

The American people—and I among them—seek no profit from the sweated pennies of the Malaysian peasants. But before we put all our eggs into Mr. Fischer's or any other idealistic basket, we must make sure that we have an "out," a line of strategic retreat.

Is this reactionary? If it is, then I am proud to be a reactionary.

Mr. Fischer tries to pin me down with a piece of dialectic sophistry. He writes: "If Culbertson believes in the necessity of protective zones for the major powers, his whole World Federation Plan is nonsense. You either believe in security through international organization or you don't. Apparently, Ely Culbertson doesn't." I do most fervently believe in security through the World Federation. But I also believe in the time factor. There will be a time-lag between the beginning and the completion of the establishment of the World Federation as a substitute for power politics. However carefully blueprinted, the World Federation will have to be tested in actual operation. Until then the great powers will naturally not give up any of their own means of defense or their own strategic zones. Certainly Russia will not give up an inch, and neither will Britain unless compensated elsewhere. Hence the concept of the National Contingents and the Strategic Zones for the big four of the United Nations. Hence my "pandering," as Mr. Fischer calls it, to victorious Britain, Russia, China, and the United States. The concept of Strategic Zones in the World Federation Plan not only limits the ambitions of individual great powers to a reasonable minimum but is the only safe way for the great powers to agree to the establishment of a true world organization endowed with a powerful international police. Has Fischer talked with any of our Senators?

At this point Louis Fischer wanders into the world of cards, forgetting that dialectics can be used in cards only as alibis for blunders, not as a foundation for a system. He compares my territorial arrangements of the world to my playing solitaire with a deck of cards marked with the names of countries. "When the 'Latvia' card turned up he [Culbertson] placed it on top of 'Russia,' and 'Estonia' on top of that, but 'Lithuania' went into a separate pile." Louis Fischer ends up with brotherly advice: "Culbertson should quit playing solitaire and go back to bridge." I don't want to hurt Fischer's feelings, but he really doesn't know solitaire in any one of its fifty-seven varieties. The bizarre world of cards is inexorably logical. One of the most logical of its games is solitaire, where the cards unravel themselves in just order and symmetry. Louis Fischer has confounded the noble game of solitaire with a card game played by Russian children. The game is called Durachok (Silly One,) and there you can do just about as you want; some Americans play this game under a different name.

After this little excursion into the world of cards, Louis Fischer takes up the Quota Force Principle (International Police Force). Here he misses entirely the structure and tremendous implications of the Mobile Corps.

The Mobile Corps is the collective army of the small nations and the largest division of the World Police. Not only the fascists but many conservatives and liberals believe that the sovereign small nations are a historical anachronism and that they should be eliminated. I, on the contrary, want to preserve the sovereign status of every small nation in the world and even add to their number by providing machinery for the establishment of new sovereign nations from liberated colonial peoples.

My concept of the Mobile Corps is of a permanent collective army composed of regiments of volunteers from the small nations—an army which is psychologically certain to fight under the World Federation against any aggressor, for thereby its units defend their own countries. The small nations seek to survive, not to conquer. The total population of the small nations is more than 300,000,000. These small nations, though individually powerless, can collectively become the most powerful force for peace in the world, provided they are integrated in a perpetual alliance through the machinery of the World Federation. Thus the Mobile Corps will become a natural and permanent ally of any power which is fighting to defend itself against an aggressor. Alone, the United States might be at the mercy of some future powerful combination of great powers; with the Mobile Corps the United States will be invincible against any combination of aggressor nations. This alone should make the World Federation a thousand times worth while. Is this imperialism, Mr. Fischer?

Fischer's reasoning fared as badly with the National Contingents, which also form part of the World Police, as with the Mobile Corps. Fischer starts by chiding Bertrand Russell for approving of the Quota Force mechanism: "... mathematics is not the soul of politics." Who ever claimed it was? The soul of politics is power, and I have asked Bertrand Russell to help me because I consider him one of the truly great authorities on power.

But power is not the soul of Fischerian politics. Fischer gallops through the Quota Force Principle to arrive at the following startling conclusion: "If Culbertson is so sure that no nation will engage in aggression, and that all nations will cooperate with the World Federation, why does he need the National Contingents? Maybe just a Mobile Corps would suffice. Maybe all you need is general disarmament and a limited police force."

Here again Fischer has hurled a bomb charged with sawdust. Into five short lines he managed to crowd five errors and distortions. I never assumed that "no nation will engage in aggression," or that "all nations will cooperate with the World Federation." The Quota Force mechanism is built on precisely opposite assumptions.

Some nations will seek aggression, and many nations will refuse to cooperate. Why do we need the National Contingents and why would the Mobile Corps alone not suffice? Look up the Problem No. 1 of Lasting Peace on pages 28 and 29 of my Summary, Mr. Fischer! If Fischer would read through my Summary even once he would find why all the glib generalities about "general disarmament," "international police force," and "United Nations policing" are just so much meaningless gibberish.

In the World Federation Plan the World Police will have the monopoly of heavy weapons—armored ships of land, sea, and air. The Mobile Corps will have 22 per cent of the total strength, and the National Contingents, made up of the citizens of the eleven largest nations and stationed as reserves in their respective territories, will have 78 per cent. The United States contingent will form 20 per cent of the World Police, the British and Russian 15 per cent each, and those of the other initiating states the remaining 28 per cent. Obviously, the three great victorious powers would not consent to disarm themselves completely and to place their destiny in the hands of the Mobile Corps—under the full control of the government of the World Federation—unless they had some safeguard against possible abuses of the World Federation government and against the possible praetorianism of the Mobile Corps. If Louis Fischer can get the consent of the United States Senate, the British Parliament, and Stalin to an International Police without the National Contingents, I will kiss him reverently and make him my own special incarnation of Buddha. It might pay Fischer to bone up on the origin of our National Guards.

Mr. Fischer himself is a conscientious and often brilliant writer. In analyzing a plan that has won the approval of a great number of leading intellectuals, how was it possible for him to write such a distorted and prejudiced critique? The answer is obvious. He had on his special ideological spectacles. The World Federation Plan, with its realistic implications, went against his welfare-politics of the world. Therefore the plan is unrealistic, imperialistic, atavistic, reactionary. Fischer does not want an international organization based on realities; he wants an International Salvation Army, singing hymns to Economic Justice—hymns which, preferably, are composed by him and his friends.

The difference between Louis Fischer's kind of idealism and my own arises from the fundamental difference between his and my diagnosis of the ills that beset the world. He ascribes the profound perturbations of the world today to social injustices, and he valiantly strives to remedy them. I am ready to travel that far with him. But social injustices have always existed, and yet we have not always had the incredible worldwide horrors of today. There is something happening in the world which is more than the economic unrest of peoples, and which is so pregnant with danger to democracy that the liberal or socialistic economic formulas do not suffice.

This something that is happening is specifically the revolution in communications and in the nature of military weapons. This technical revolution has had three portentous results: (1) the masses in all the states have become disarmed; (2) seventy-odd sovereign states have lost the power to resist aggression, and the monopoly of decisive heavy weapons has passed into the hands of a few mutually antagonistic states; (3) new and vastly populous states, heretofore dormant, are rapidly entering the industrial stage of development, possibly to bid, under future Hitlers, for the domination of the world.

Our modern democracy was born in the smoke of gunpowder when bullets pierced the armor of the knight and cannon balls destroyed his castle. Bullets, not ballots, are the true sentinels of democracy. Today the peoples and their true leaders are virtually disarmed by tanks and planes. The armored knight has returned with bolts of lightning in his hand, traveling in the air at 400 miles an hour. The castle is moving on wheels at 50 miles an hour. Everywhere violent minorities can seize the levers of the state and deprive the people of all hope of redemption. Rifles have become sticks. The day of barricades is over, and so is the day of barricade revolutionists. The only forces still working to preserve our democratic freedom are the psycho-social forces of habit and tradition. The reality of physical force is leaving the peoples.

Louis Fischer thinks perhaps that this is a world revolution of the peoples on the march toward their final liberation. I say this is a world counter-revolution against the peoples everywhere, who are more and more disarmed. In the past, democracy flourished where the nature of weapons and military structure favored the defense of freedom by the peoples themselves. Such conditions no longer prevail. The evidence is strong that the neo-feudalists will be the victors in the continuing post-war struggle, even though the democracies and Soviet Russia will have won the war.

If by a miracle some democracies escape tyranny at home, they must inevitably face future dictatorships if they wish to survive in the ever-widening swing of greater wars to come. Another war like this one and democracy will be a hollow word, even in the United States. All freedoms depend upon Freedom from War. And Freedom from War can be secured only by segregating the decisive heavy weapons and making it impossible for any government or clique to use these weapons either for aggressive war or for tyranny at home.

The tragic mistake of most liberals today is to seek to prevent war by removing the causes of wars. The causes of wars are many and deep-seated. It will take generations to remove them, and in the meantime there will be new wars which will destroy our way of life. The only solution is to segregate the means of making war, which are few—the armored ships of air, sea, and land—and to establish an indestructible alliance of the surviving democracies. This can be done only through the Quota Force mechanism integrated in the World Federation.

It cannot be done with childish visions of peoples descending like battalions of angels to throw down Satan and enthrone the god of humanity. Nor can it be done by economic alchemy. Before attempting anything else, and regardless of sacrifice, we must make it impossible for violent minorities to use the terrifying modern weapons for the enslavement of their own peoples or for the conquest of other nations. We must transform these decisive weapons from instruments of oppression into instruments of defense for all peace-loving nations and put war itself into a strait-jacket. Fischer—somehow he could not get playing cards out of his head—says that the deck of cards with which I deal is old. At least it is not a deck of marked cards. Fischer is blissfully unaware that the new deck of his dreams is stacked by history against him and against all of us. Among players it is known as a sucker's deck.

Fischer has written a great deal about Lenin. But the main lesson of Lenin he has never learned: Lenin was a supreme political strategist. He dreamed the liberation of peoples, but he lived and breathed the reality of social forces around him. He did not hesitate to make a deal with the enemies of his country so as to get into his country; he was not ashamed to choose as his headquarters the palace of a ballerina, mistress of the Czar. While the Kerenskys orated, he ceaselessly worked on precise, detailed blueprints for action. After he and his group of idealists seized the Russian state and the going got rough, he did not hesitate to beat a retreat.

American progressives of the Louis Fischer kind must wake up to reality. They must retreat from the clouds. They must stop fiddling their little ideological tunes while the world is ablaze. We want them to help us in the decisive battle for freedom—the battle which is only beginning. There are overwhelming forces for peace which we could organize if we had a practical plan, a bridge into the future. The World Federation Plan is the first blueprint for such a bridge. I cannot begin to say how many things are wrong with it. But it is a blueprint for work, not for dreams. It is anchored in the realities of today and tomorrow. Once over this bridge, the peoples of the world, during two or three generations at least, can achieve Freedom from War; and once the nations are free from this social cancer they can start, each in its own way, and all together, building a new world of economic and political justice. Better planners and builders will come who will improve immeasurably this new bridge into the post-war world. And when they come, as they are already coming, where will Louis Fischer be?

He will be playing solitaire—and cheating himself.

How Our Enemies Fight

II. JAPANESE BATTLE TECHNIQUE

BY GORDON COOPER

THE geographic position of the Japanese islands off the northeastern littoral of Asia is not unlike that of Britain in relation to the northwestern coast of Europe. Japanese policy too has a resemblance to that of Britain before the latter in 1585 abandoned its attempts to dominate Europe and adopted the theory of Continental balance of power and an overseas empire. Any attempt by Japan, however, to "divide and rule" in Asia has been precluded for most of its history by the sheer mass of the Chinese Empire, and it is only natural, therefore, that Tokyo should have followed the early rather than the later policies of Britain. Thus it has always envisaged the conquest of China and hegemony over eastern Asia as the first step toward the realization of those dreams of world domination which are based on its fundamental religious concept, Shintoism.

The opening of the Sino-Japanese conflict in 1937 marked Japan's first large-scale bid for world power. Far too little attention was paid to the purely military aspects of this campaign; if we had followed it more closely, some of the surprises which Japan had in store for us might not have been so shocking. Professional opinion has never indorsed the idea, often met in popular accounts of this war, that Japan was "bogged down" in China. For instance, Lieutenant Colonel (now General) Charles A. Willoughby of the United States army, in his "Maneuver in War," published in 1939, expressed the greatest respect for Japan's military prowess:

In the field of strategy, in staff work, in concept and execution of maneuver [he wrote] the Japanese High Command has established a high performance record. From a strictly professional viewpoint, the colossal range of Japanese operations is of Napoleonic proportions. . . . There is an odd similarity between the Sino-Japanese War and the struggle of the Confederacy in the American Civil War; in the respective theaters of war New Orleans and Washington are approximately in the same relative locations as Canton and Shanghai. The "Anacanda" plan, which throttled the Confederacy by blockading its eastern ports while the drive on Vicksburg cut it in half, is duplicated in the seizures of Amoy, Foochow, and Canton, and the drive on Hankow.

During this campaign the Japanese were always outnumbered, sometimes as much as seven to one, yet by 1941 they had not only succeeded in subduing the coastal plains of China—one of the world's four great population centers, with about 200,000,000 people and most of China's industrial wealth—but had tested out Russian defenses in three attacks, seized Indo-China from a beaten France, and for all practical purposes achieved control of Thailand. These southern operations ended the second phase of Japanese expansion and incidentally left only one gateway, the Burma road, open to supplies moving into China. Japan then felt secure enough to contemplate moving on the American-British-Dutch possessions in the Far East. The importance of Japan's occupation of Indo-China cannot be overemphasized, for it placed in Japanese hands the key to southern Asia with just as much certainty as the occupation of Korea had unlocked the door in the north. Here was a central base from which to operate against the Philippines, Borneo, Malaya, Sumatra, Java, and Burma. The Formosa-Canton-Hainan line, backed by Indo-China, became infinitely stronger than the Anglo-American Hongkong-Manila line.

The third phase of Japanese operations, that against the American-British-Dutch possessions, was a masterpiece of campaigning by air, sea, and land. Japan moved an estimated 300,000 combat troops formed into task forces over millions of square miles of land and sea—everywhere with complete success. The strength necessary to achieve specific objectives was always adequate; logistic problems, in spite of the multiplicity of objectives and the varying necessities of terrain, were solved either by prefabrication of special means or adaptation of local facilities. In this phase of its operations Japan remedied what Admiral Hart has called its one serious weakness, lack of "space." In six months it gained an empire second only to that of Britain and cut off its primary enemy, China, almost completely from outside supplies. For the moment Japan itself can be seriously attacked from only two directions—from China and from Siberia. China may be considered little more than a nuisance so long as it lacks essential armaments; Siberia can hardly offer a serious threat so long as the Nazis keep Russia engaged elsewhere. But in any case Japan has taken full precautions against invasion from the north by turning Manchuria into an arsenal and maintaining along the Amur an army, now fully acclimatized after years of occupation, variously estimated at 250,000 to 1,000,000 men.

The point about these operations is that Japan everywhere used power that was adequate to achieve its objectives. It should be remembered also that, unlike Germany, Japan has not only operated a huge army and air force but the second-largest fleet in the world. If Germany had been in possession of such a fleet, together with its other forces, it would not have had to pause at Calais and Crete. In Japanese strategy, then, we have seen for the first time air, sea, and land forces used in combination; by means of them every industrial and raw-material center in eastern Asia except Vladivostok and Calcutta has been occupied. There are still weaknesses in Japan's military position, but given time to consolidate its mushroom empire it could make itself impregnable against anything less than a world coalition. Nor need we have any doubt about the extent of Japanese ambitions, which have been succinctly summarized by General Nonaka: "The ultimate conclusion of politics is the conquest of the world by one imperial power. . . . The Japanese nation is bracing herself to fill her destined role."

In its accomplishments so far Japan has adapted its strategy to the peculiarities of its situation. Space was the first need, and the opposition to be overcome in acquiring it was furnished, in every case but one, by only the outlying bases of nations whose power centers lay in distant parts of the globe. The single exception was China, whose armed potential was dependent on a very small industrial area, plus imported supplies. Therefore by the acquisition of space Japan not only provided for its own necessities but accomplished the Far Eastern downfall of its enemies. It was not necessary for Japan to reduce the British Isles to accomplish its purpose in these opening rounds of world conquest. To bring about the collapse of Britain's eastern possessions it was sufficient to reduce Singapore and Hongkong. It was not necessary to occupy Hawaii but merely to knock out Pearl Harbor for a short interval. In China it was necessary only to occupy the small industrial area and to block the entrances for foreign supplies. Everywhere Japanese forces met opponents who were on the defensive. Nowhere did they meet the aggressive counter-offensives which had checked them so successfully in Asiatic Russia. On the banks of the Amur in July, 1937, at Changkufeng in August, 1938, and on the Outer Mongolian border at Nomonhan in May, 1939, Soviet forces counter-attacked with fury and success. In each case the Japanese broke off the engagement and retired.

The characteristic mark, then, of Japanese style is the bold offensive against a key defensive position, an offensive designed to drive back but not necessarily to wipe out the enemy, and always to take advantage of the enemy's weakness in preference to opposing his strength.

The Japanese High Command's thorough grasp of the seven principles of strategy discussed in the first article of this series is clear to all observers.

Economy of Force. This principle has indeed been a law in Japanese campaigns. To students of its operations it has sometimes seemed uncanny that Japan could judge so precisely the forces necessary for attaining certain objectives. The area in the lower Solomons surrounding Tulagi, one of the finest harbors in the Pacific, originally fell to a force of ten Japanese soldiers and one plane. Japan's ability to use just enough strength and no more was one, if not the main, reason that its strength was so underestimated; its forces were always adequate up to the Battle of the Coral Sea.

Mobility. Lieutenant Colonel Warren J. Clear, U. S. A., in the Infantry Journal testifies to Japanese soldiers on maneuvers marching 122 miles in 72 hours, with rifle, 150 rounds of ammunition, and a 40-pound pack, and after only four hours of sleep ending up on the double quick. When the history of the Far Eastern campaign is written it will certainly tell of many such feats. Japanese mobility has also been exemplified by skilful amphibious operations at beachheads with no permanent installations. This kind of mobility, coupled with the island hopping of the land-based air forces, has allowed the Japanese everywhere to use the indirect approach. The speedy passage through dangerous waters of the Japanese convoys and naval task forces can be laid to the patient surveys carried out for years by the Japanese "fishing fleet." The ability to supply reinforcements when and where needed in sufficient numbers was a striking feature of last year's December to May campaign.

Surprise. The surprise offensive has always been a favorite stratagem of the Japanese. It was used in 1598 by Hideyoshi, in 1894 against China, and in 1905 against Russia. The Japanese military find the moral indignation it arouses in the West merely amusing, another weakness to be exploited. Some of Japan's greatest successes in the present war have been scored by means of this device, and it is more than possible that there will be further instances of its use.

Offensive Action. Adherence to this principle has always been a cardinal feature of Japanese strategy. In the first months of this war Japan showed the ability to mount an offensive of truly grand proportions, one of the greatest in the history of warfare.

Concentration of Combat Power. Combat power in this campaign was not concentrated against any one objective but was spread over the Far East in pursuit of objectives of opportunity. This was at once the strength and the weakness of Japanese strategy. As it turned out, it was successful. Nevertheless, it was a gamble, and it is possible that against a more alert enemy this dispersal of strength might have cost the Japanese dearly. From the point of view of strategic theory, it must be considered an error, although one dictated, perhaps, by the geography of the region. In the event, it was the besieged colonial powers which suffered: they had so many key points to defend in the island-studded waters of the southern Pacific that they were unable to concentrate their forces anywhere. The same geographic factors, however, will operate to the disadvantage of Japan when it must hold its conquests against counter-attack.

Security. That after Pearl Harbor Japan relied primarily on the impotence of its opponents to insure its security is shown by the feeble resistance offered to American bombers over Tokyo and the success of the Chinese operations around Changsha. The Aleutian landings, however, indicated that Japan later became alert to the necessity for special measures for additional security.

Cooperation. The cooperation shown by the Japanese services has been altogether admirable, even worthy of imitation. Air, sea, and land forces were welded together to form the offensive machine that accomplished so much.

The first definite checks to Japanese offensive action were in the Coral Sea in May and at Midway in June. With these engagements the third phase of Japanese expansion can be considered to have closed. In assessing Japanese operations during this period there seems to be some danger of overestimating Japanese military capabilities on the basis of results from one campaign, and this a campaign which was opportunistically carried out with the aid of "on-the-spot" air power while the main forces of the opponents were pointed elsewhere.

Since Pearl Harbor, Japanese successes have been achieved against detached forces, against only part of the enemy's strength. These operations are interesting to the non-professional student chiefly because they illustrate the cooperation and mobility necessary in an air-sea-land war and because they may provide some clues to Japan's future course. Japanese ability to combine land, sea, and air tactics has changed many strategic conceptions. In this campaign coastal fortifications were no longer reduced by fleet bombardment and the harbor area cleared and held by marines so that its installations could be used to unload the army's heavy equipment. The construction of special equipment made it possible to land the heaviest material on almost any unprotected beach. Artillery, tanks, and engineering supplies for the immediate construction of airfields were floated ashore in specially designed barges, and the full power of an expeditionary force was brought immediately to bear. Since Japan's amphibious troops could be landed on any unprotected beach, such fortresses as Singapore and Corregidor were taken from the rear; they were never able to fire a shot at the enemy's battle fleet, the purpose for which they had been built. Hongkong, with its fortifications facing the sea, was also attacked from an unexpected quarter and was reduced in a matter of days, not weeks or months.

GATHER YE ROSEBUDS WHILE YE MAY

If such a strategic plan for the reduction of Hongkong, Singapore, and Manila now seems simple and obvious, we need only recall the British-Free French assault on Dakar a few months earlier to understand the revolutionary character of Japanese methods. They open any unprotected coast to successful assault by a force immediately strong enough to exploit and consolidate its opportunity. When it is remembered that, in addition, Japan's use of the torpedo plane made the United States radically overhaul its naval building program, formulated only a little over a year before, the gigantic proportions of the revolution in warfare wrought by this campaign begin to appear. One may say that the Japanese did for amphibious operations what the Germans did for land warfare with their mechanized technique.

What clues to the future can the study of these operations give us? During the ten months since the close of the Japanese offensive the United Nations have been busy primarily in building up forces and establishing bases in the operating theater. In order to do this undisturbed a tactical offensive has been undertaken in a number of places around the periphery of Japanese power. These measures have all been good defensive strategy, but they have engaged only a minor portion of the total Japanese strength—a minor portion of the ground forces, of the air force, and of the fleet. The major part of this great war machine that has been years in building has been disengaged although available.

The only summary that seems applicable therefore is to say that the Japanese have achieved a brilliant "fact of arms." Their defeat without Soviet assistance will be extremely difficult, for geographically they are most vulnerable on the Siberian front. To open the supply route to China through Burma, the only other way to obtain a continental base of operations, would require a full-dress campaign and draw heavily on forces that at present might be used to better advantage elsewhere. From the standpoint of strategic theory, opportunities for maneuver are offered by Japan's dispersal of its forces and possibly by its neglect of security measures.

If analysis of Japan's past strategic practices shows us anything, it shows that we may expect it to launch a bold, well-planned, and well-timed offensive stroke, using a good part of its idle forces. It may even be that the Japanese, who have shown themselves to be astute strategists, will wait until the United Nations have irrevocably committed themselves in some quarter. Then, while endeavoring to contain this United Nations effort and draw its sting by the use of their new-won space, they will strike at some other vital point in the Allied position.

As Ambassador Grew has said, "Japan is today potentially the strongest power in the world. . . . Man for man, nation for nation [it] measures up to the highest standards of organized power in the world." To underestimate Japanese power again on the basis of the start, good as it may be, that we have made toward victory, would be the worst kind of folly.

THE COLLEGES throughout the country are giving special courses to meet war needs. . . . In carrying out this or any other related plan, the colleges must not allow themselves to be swept off their feet by the present exigency. . . . The supreme duty of the college remains what it has always been—to teach students to think. . . . In war as in peace, the college must never forget its chief task.—May 4, 1918.

THE UNITED STATES this week has seen the culmination of several trials and indictments under the Espionage Act. . . . In New York the trial of four members of the staff of the Masses, a radical monthly that has gone out of existence, . . . ended in a disagreement and discharge of the jury after forty-two hours' deliberation. Mr. Biddle Is Afraid

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, May 16

THE ugliest forces in American life are on display again in Congress, and the spectacle may make one wonder whether we are indeed divinely ordained to bring sweetness and light to the rest of the world, banishing its despots and reeducating its children. Although we like to think of ourselves as somehow better than other nations, more high-minded, more disinterested, more humane, I know of no other country—unless it be the fascist states—in whose parliament one could have heard more drivel and seen more hypocrisy than in the House of Representatives last week.

Eugene E. Cox

The House has many hard-working, able, and devoted men, but it also has a large and noisy contingent of ignoramuses, proto-fascists, pompous asses, and (a few) devious crooks. This group has the capital by the ears; decent administrators shake in their swivel chairs at its approach; and the Attorney General looks the other way and writes books on Justice Holmes.

One of the most dubious characters in this gang is Representative Eugene E. ("Goober") Cox of Georgia, a friend of the peanut. Since March, 1942, the Attorney General, Francis Biddle, has been sitting uneasily on documents involving Cox and Section 113 of the United States Criminal Code. Section 113 makes it a felony punishable by a $10,000 fine and two years in jail for a Congressman who "shall . . . directly or indirectly receive . . . any compensation whatever for any services rendered . . . in relation to any proceeding" before a federal agency. The Attorney General has evidence which shows that Congressman Cox communicated at least twenty-five times with the FCC to obtain a license for Station WALB in his district, that he received a check for $2,500 from the owners of the station a month after the license was granted, and that with the check was a voucher marked "legal expense." The evidence consists of FCC records and the originals of the check and the voucher.

Where were the services rendered for which Cox was paid $2,500? The FCC sent the Attorney General a copy of a sworn statement by C. D. Tounsley, secretary-treasurer of the broadcasting company. This statement says that Cox performed no services for the company in his home town—Albany, Georgia. It also says, "Radio Station WALB has never at any time and does not now have any Washington representation other than that provided by E. E. Cox." It may be that Representative Cox is the victim of coincidence, that the $2,500 fee was for legal services other than his lobbying of the FCC in behalf of this radio station. One would expect him to insist on the legal proceedings which could alone clear him of suspicion.

But whether Cox insists upon it or not, the submission of this evidence to the federal grand jury is many months overdue. The duty of submitting it rests upon the Attorney General, and the Washington Post was right when it suggested in a courageous editorial that Biddle will himself "be guilty of gross misconduct in office" if he does not do so. Since fourteen months have passed since the FCC referred the evidence to the Attorney General for action, it is clear that he is afraid to enforce the law.

The honor of Congress and the political future of the New Deal are both involved in this scabrous affair. For instead of the FCC prosecuting Cox, Cox is prosecuting the FCC and through it, he hopes, the New Deal. He and his friends from Wall Street and the poll-tax belt have focused their fire on the FCC, and think a hearty smearing of that agency will help block the reelection of Roosevelt in 1944; Cox himself, though Roosevelt's Attorney General has been shielding him from a grand jury, is on record for Farley. In recent weeks the Costello committee on draft deferments (with its Coughlinite counsel), the Kerr committee on so-called "subversives" (a synonym, in the Congressional lexicon, for anti-fascists), and the Dies committee have all been doing their best to make the FCC's life miserable. The main job, of course, has been in the hands of the Cox committee. And it is this committee which represents the real test of Congressional integrity.

Though some of the facts in the Cox case have long been Washington gossip and have several times leaked into the press—this correspondent published the first story on them a year ago—full disclosure has until now been prevented by the inaction of the Attorney General and the timidity of the FCC, both stemming, I suspect, from the continued efforts of the White House to appease the inappeasable Cox and his clique. The complete story was not known or its import understood until Clifford J. Durr, a member of the FCC, courageously appealed to the House last week over the heads of the Cox committee and made the suppressed documents available in photostatic form to Congress and the press. Durr formally petitioned the House to disqualify Cox as chairman and member of the Cox committee to investigate the Federal Communications Commission. He buttressed that petition and its accompanying exhibits with a formidable array of parliamentary precedent. But it should take no learned disquisition to make decent members of the House realize the impropriety of permitting what must be a "spite" investigation so long as Cox is in charge of it.

The House now knows that the member who suggested, and is in charge of, the investigation of the FCC has a deep personal interest in discrediting that agency. The House now has before it photostats of the documents sent to Biddle and knows that Cox's eagerness to investigate the FCC followed its discovery of his personal interest in the WALB Radio Station case. The House now knows that Cox owns stock in that radio station and that the station even now has a petition for renewal of license before the FCC. The House now knows that Cox has been taking advantage of his position to cart away FCC records by the truckload, often without allowing time to list what was taken or to see to it that proper receipts were given for irreplaceable government records. The House now knows that Cox has been forcing FCC employees to testify under oath in closed session before him alone, with no counsel or observer for the commission present and without granting these employees even the right to a transcript of the testimony. These facts and their bearing on the petition to disqualify Cox are before the Judiciary Committee. If that committee and the House itself nevertheless permit Cox to continue in charge of this investigation, they will be displaying either a cowardly unwillingness to enforce the basic principles of fair procedure and the decent conduct of legislative affairs or a brazen readiness to trample on them.

For the New Deal and for the country this case is a crucial one. Cox's career may be at stake, and unlike the New Dealers he is not being pusillanimous in defending himself. He has surrounded himself on his committee with people who hate the New Deal as much as he does. He appointed as counsel a Wall Street lawyer who is a partner of Raoul B. Desvernine, one of the famous fifty-nine who made up the American Liberty League's own private Sanhedrin for the invalidation of New Deal legislation. As chief investigator Cox picked a man named Larson who left the FBI some years back to do "plant protection" for General Motors and later opened a detective agency in Detroit. The counsel, Eugene L. Garey, has a clientèle which includes a number of Wall Street brokerage houses suspended by the SEC, and he shares Cox's hatred for "bureaucracy." If they succeed in defeating and punishing Durr for his courage, there will be few men left bold enough to raise their voices here. The worst elements of Southern Democracy and Northern big business will have won a resounding victory that will have its effect on every administrative agency in the capital and will not go unnoticed by our allies abroad.

Underground Humor

COMPILED BY JOACHIM JOESTEN

NO OTHER occupied country quite matches the skill of France in heaping deadly ridicule on the invader and his puppets. To all those who cherish France as their second country this fact is a great source of comfort. For a nation which still fights back with its wits cannot be as dead as some would have us believe. The following anecdotes are offered as typical examples of the humor that the people are using as a weapon in oppressed France:

In Lille an audacious little street arab stopped a German officer to ask him the time.

"Twenty minutes to twelve," the German answered politely.

"Okay," said the boy, "if it's twenty minutes to twelve, then at twelve sharp you can go jump in the lake." After which the lad tore down the street with the Nazi at his heels. Rounding a corner too sharply, the German ran into a gendarme.

"That ragamuffin told me that at twelve sharp I could go jump in the lake," he panted. The gendarme calmly studied his watch.

"Well, what's your rush?" he said. "You still have twenty minutes."

That stout-hearted policeman may now be in the same concentration camp as the farmer who gave just the right answer to a couple of Nazis swaggering by his field.

"Go ahead and sow," scoffed the Germans, "we'll do the reaping."

"I hope so," replied the farmer, "I'm sowing hemp."

A Frenchman went to the Kommandantur to inquire how he could become a naturalized German. The officer in charge warned him patronizingly. "Do you realize, my friend, that as a German citizen you will be liable to the draft? You might even be sent to the Russian front and get killed."

"So what?" came the reply. "Then there'll be one damn Boche less."

General von Stülpnagel, in charge of the occupying forces in Paris, arrived late for dinner at the house of a sham collaborationist. Apologizing for the delay, he said, "These acts of discipline keep me very busy. I have just ordered the execution of another hundred hostages."

Silence. Then the mistress of the house asked suavely, "Wouldn't you like to wash your hands, General?"

At a Cabinet meeting in Vichy Pierre Laval observed that one of his councilors, a professor of the University of Paris, nonchalantly drew forth first his handkerchief, then an offensive-looking pipe, and then an even shabbier tobacco pouch, ranging these objects on the table before him.

Laval, aghast at this lack of etiquette, exclaimed, "But, Monsieur, you empty your pockets!"

Whereupon the savant retorted, "Isn't that better than if I filled them?"

One day the great Spanish painter Picasso, who was trapped in Paris by the swift German advance, was called to the Kommandantur.

A petulant Nazi officer snapped at him, "You are the anti-fascist painter?"

"I am a painter, indeed," Picasso calmly replied.

The Nazi thrust a photograph under his nose. It was of Picasso's famous painting "Guernica," showing the havoc wrought by Nazi dive bombers in that unhappy Spanish town during the civil war.

"Did you do this?" the Nazi shouted.

"No, sir," was the reply, "you did."

Going back to Laval, the story is told that he decided one night to find out for himself just what the French people thought of him. Heavily disguised, he entered a tavern and sat down at the bar.

"How is everything?" he asked the bartender.

"Bad," was the frank answer.

"By the way, what do you think of Laval?"

The bartender looked around cautiously. "I don't like such questions. You know, with the Gestapo everywhere."

"I won't tell anyone," the other insisted.

"Yes, but if any of my customers overheard us I would be ruined."

"You can trust me. I swear I won't say a word."

The bartender hesitated, then leaned forward and whispered, "To tell the truth, I rather like him."

A Paris bookseller filled his shop window with three portraits of Pétain, Darlan, and Laval. Beneath he placed a harmless French classic, Victor Hugo's "Les Misérables." Another displayed a picture of Hitler and spread out before it a map of France. Between the two he laid a copy of Claude Farrère's "L'Homme qui assassina." A third put pictures of Pétain and Laval in his window and placed beneath them small notices which read, Epuisé (Exhausted) and Vendu (Sold Out).

INVESTORS in war industries need not fear the economic consequences of the peace. Standard and Poore's Industrial Reports offer these words of cheer in a special supplement on General Motors: "Business concerns which have been at all careful in framing their war-production contracts will not be heavily embarrassed by cancellations. The government will be embarrassed. The taxpayers will be embarrassed. But not necessarily stockowners. Contracts have been drawn that way, as they should have been."

ELIMINATION of Dr. Harold Rugg's textbooks from the public schools of San Francisco, boasts Advertising Age, was "a direct result of the efforts of the Pacific Advertising Association's school committee."

GERALD L. K. SMITH, in The Cross and the Flag, makes the most cogent argument against Ely Culbertson's World Federation Plan: "As might be expected, he speaks with a Russian accent, was born in Rumania, and is a great admirer of the philosophy of Karl Marx." The first two counts of the indictment are true. As for the third, in 1932 Culbertson published a book entitled "Red Russia Against the World." The 1940-41 edition of "Who's Who in America" lists it in Culbertson's biography; the 1942-43 edition does not.

THE INQUIRING PHOTOGRAPHER of a New York newspaper recently asked an ensign in the Waves how she felt about having dates with service men who are not officers. "I don't mind," she said. "I believe in democracy—but don't you print that! I might get into trouble." It was not printed.

THERE WAS a little flurry behind the scenes of the recent "Town Meeting of the Air" broadcast from Pittsburgh when its local sponsors learned that the topic would be, "Should the President of the United States have a fourth term?" George A. Blackmore, chairman of the Westinghouse Air Brake Company, resigned as chairman of the sponsoring committee, and Dr. James H. Greene, executive vice-president of the Pittsburgh Chamber of Commerce, resigned as a committee member. They said the program was a Democratic trial balloon. Both withdrew the money they had collected for the meeting, some $1,600, and turned it over to the USO. The rest of the committee carried on and raised enough to cover expenses, which were less than $800.

FESTUNG EUROPA: The official organ of the Dutch Nazi Elite Guard tells of the trouble the Guard had at one of its recent parades: "The marchers repeatedly had to break ranks to turn the heads of the citizens the right way."

The Peacemaker of Almeria

FACTS continue to be unkind to the partisans of expediency. Speaking of the underground in the last issue of The Nation I suggested, first, that the French underground supported De Gaulle; second, that the underground in general has not received due attention from the governments of the United Nations and has often been sabotaged through indifference or animosity.

A few days after the publication of the editorial, a dispatch from Geoffrey Parsons, Jr., in the New York Herald Tribune described the creation of a "Council of French Resistance" in France on which every section of the underground was represented. Included were the "groups of resistance," the political parties, and the labor unions—all backing De Gaulle and working in perfect accord with the National Committee of the Fighting French in London. "The formation of the council," Mr. Parsons wrote, "was brought about by followers of De Gaulle with the active encouragement of the British government. The American government had an opportunity to help but declined, this correspondent learned today from one of the Frenchmen who were in Paris recently, assisting in the organization of the council." And yet the unification and strengthening of the forces of resistance is of the greatest importance at this time.

Nothing is more illusory than the hope of rallying against the Axis those people whose fate would be sealed by an Axis defeat. Every comment on the development of the Spanish situation printed in these columns has underlined the interdependence of the Franco regime and the Axis. The form which that interdependence would take before the war ended nobody could anticipate, not even Franco himself. Whether Hitler would finally march into Spain, whether he preferred to keep Franco "neutral" for purely military reasons or because he feared internal revolt in Spain—these questions did not affect the main issue. The main issue was whether or not Franco's servitude to Hitler could be broken. If it could not be broken by the efforts of the United Nations, then the policy they have pursued until now was utterly wrong. Franco's recent speech at Almeria offered definitive proof that the United Nations have been wrong.

A week richer in happy events than any we have had in years made it easy to forget the Almeria speech. But Axis propaganda put it to good use. All the pro-Axis papers of Latin America honored it with front-page coverage. Radio Berlin, Radio Rome, Radio Vichy referred to it again and again. The speech was really a superb piece of work, in the best Goebbels style. The African campaign had ended in disaster for the Axis, and on the eve of the great Allied offensive in Europe Franco came forth with his theory of stalemate. He bluntly proclaimed that the warring nations had "reached what may be called the dead point in the struggle. None of the belligerents has the power to destroy its opponent." He conveniently ignored the fact that under present circumstances anything less than complete victory for the United Nations would be a major victory for Hitler. And for Franco, too. A stalemate which would leave the road open to all kinds of diplomatic maneuvering—what rosier outlook could be offered the Axis?

The prestige of the general who "won" the Spanish War was put at the service of the Axis. But Franco is more than a general. He is "the Christian general." Nobody is better fitted than he to address the Catholic world, especially the Hispanic Americans. In this role the defender of civilization warns the Allies: Not only will you British and Americans not succeed in breaking the stalemate, but while your armies bleed in a senseless fight, the only winner, communism, will conquer the world. What more could Berlin expect from Franco?

Almeria came after Barcelona. During the time between the Jordana and the Franco speeches something had happened which made any misunderstanding in regard to the attitude of the Allies impossible. In Monterrey, raising his voice, and in a mood distinct from that of the rest of his address, President Roosevelt called for "unconditional surrender!" Jordana's Barcelona appeal had been abruptly rejected. No real neutral would have insisted a second time. But less than three weeks after the Barcelona broadcast the Spanish-German propaganda machine renewed its campaign for a negotiated peace to head off the Bolshevik danger. Since, in the meantime, the military situation had become more serious, a mere Foreign Minister was considered inadequate. The Spanish Chief of State, in person, was ordered to the microphone.

Franco pretended that in appealing to both sides to end the war he was acting in agreement with the Vatican. Since then we have heard—in a broadcast from Rome—that Pope Pius is opposed to "peace at any price." Diplomacy declared his words a rebuff to Franco and, as such, satisfactory enough. We believe that if the Vatican disapproved of the Almeria speech it could have been more prompt and more explicit in its repudiation. Though it apparently rejected a too blatant Axis move, it was careful to avoid any open rebuff to the ruler of "our preferred daughter in Christ," as Pius XII recently described Phalangist Spain.

Charles Maurras

BY EMILE BURE

AMONG the newspapermen—and they are many—who contributed to the victory of Hitler and Mussolini in France, Charles Maurras, the publisher of l'Action Française, is perhaps the best known. His paper is the organ of "integral nationalism," and its masthead carries the slogan, "We stand for everything that is national."

Unchallenged by the French Republic, Maurras committed treason with such boldness that his example lent courage to other journalists who took their orders—and their pay—from Berlin, Rome, and later Madrid. Could not the Radical and Socialist governments of France have gagged him? Why was he imprisoned only once, and then for an act in which he was not directly involved? Because the government's hands were tied by a press law which granted full license to libel and slander and permitted blackmail in the name of liberalism.

Obviously of Saracen origin, Charles Maurras, with his sallow brown complexion, his sparse hair, and his steely eyes, is so ugly that on first meeting him one is reminded of the gargoyles of a Gothic cathedral. He is very deaf, and he speaks in a harsh bark. But his influence on the youth of France and on other Europeans of French education in the period between the two world wars was extraordinary.

His power is partly to be explained by the richness of his vocabulary, which dazzles the illiterate and, even more, the semi-literate. Only educated men who are not blinded by political fanaticism see how shoddy is the intellectual merchandise his vocabulary sells. No demagogue of the right or left was ever more adept than Maurras at driving home his points. Indefatigably, with an ardor that is peculiarly meridional, he repeats a lie that serves his cause, until the reader, drugged by his impudent sophistry, is finally overcome. Edouard Berth, a disciple of Georges Sorel, wrote me in 1936: "The Greeks condemned Socrates to drink the hemlock because he was a sophist and a corruptor of youth. But Socrates was a child compared to our 'old Charles,' who was once described . . . as 'the most intelligent scoundrel and the most scoundrelly intelligence in France and Navarre.'"

Maurras has borrowed all his learning from the prophets of the past, from Bonald and Joseph de Maistre, philosophers of the divine right of kings, from La Tour du Pin, advocate of a social paternalism which is obnoxious to all free men. And if on occasion he invokes the Renan of "Réforme intellectuelle et morale," or the Fustel de Coulanges of "La Cité antique," he offers but a crude travesty of their thinking. Once while I was still on good terms with Maurras I enchanted him with a phrase from Karl Marx, whom he abused daily in his newspaper without ever having read a line of his writings. The touch of a feather would have transformed Maurras into a Marxist when he learned that the author of "Das Kapital" taught that "force is the great midwife of societies in labor."

The publisher of l'Action Française boasted of having brought royalty up to date, and his methods attracted many French youths and even some older men. Actually all he did was to set up the image of a king wearing a helmet and carrying a sword and surrounded with an aura of Christianity. His Camelots du Roy, who toppled statues, slapped ministers, and beat up professors, were in the best Bonapartist tradition. They were prepared to observe the ceremonies of the church if it would sprinkle holy water on the sword of counter-revolution. They were willing to genuflect before the altar if the altar blessed the throne. In short, they were clerical but not Catholic, and certainly not Christian. Maurras's first book, "Le Chemin de Paradis," vilified Christ as an emasculator of civic energies and lashed out at the "twelve wretched Apostles."

"La seule France, chronique des jours d'épreuve," which Maurras published in Paris in 1940, is eloquent testimony to his moral and intellectual vacuity. The history of France, according to him, is quite simple: England backed the French Revolution to break the power of a France grown strong under the wise and benevolent rule of Louis XV and Louis XVI and their ministers, Choiseul and Vergennes. Then came the restoration. Again France prospered, and the British government spent its guineas to launch the revolution of 1830. When Louis Philippe came to the throne, London was reassured by his seeming pacifism, but realizing finally that the new king was not to be controlled, perfidious Albion gave the signal for another uprising—the revolution of 1848. By this stroke England rid itself of the political threat of the Bourbon-Orleans dynasty and had to face only the timid adventures of the Second Republic, the Second Empire, and the Third Republic. Thus it was in a position to make France a country of hired Continental soldiers and a frightened partner in its oceanic enterprises. The fourth revolution, from which, Maurras assures us, Germany reaped the profit, was the Dreyfus revolution. The fifth began in June, 1940, with the rebellion of De Gaulle.

Should an innocent or facetious reader of Maurras ask him, "What becomes of your monarchist conclusions in the light of your admission that neither Louis XV nor Charles X nor Louis Philippe was able to outwit the British?" he would reply, "As long as the monarchy lasted it could not be outmaneuvered, but it made the mistake of allowing itself to be overthrown by liberal and democratic rioters in the pay of London."

Before the outbreak of the present war Maurras was campaigning for a "King of the French Republic." A pat slogan, but what political system did it envisage? Maurras had visions of a king who would preside in state over pastoral fêtes where every Sunday the peasants and artisans would dance and sing in their local costumes to the music of the tambourin and the flageolet. During the rest of the week—now dressed in work clothes—they would accept without question the orders of their sovereign.

Charles Maurras made his début into public life as the secretary of Anatole France. Like many young writers of his generation he flirted for a time with the anarchist movement, though it is plain that he had not the slightest feeling for humanity; he once amazed a friend by reproaching him for having given alms to some miserable beggars. Presently he joined the staff of the Soleil, but failing to convert the Soleil into an organ of "integral nationalism," he moved to Veuillot's Gazette de France, where he made no great impression until June, 1898. In that year France was finally preparing to recognize the innocence of Captain Dreyfus. Then came the news that Colonel Henry, head of the bureau of military information, who had first formulated the charge against Dreyfus, had cut his throat in the military prison of Cherche-Midi. The anti-Dreyfusard clique was thrown into confusion. Charles Maurras appeared on the scene to allay their fears. He declared that Colonel Henry had committed suicide in order to prevent the publication of certain documents which clearly revealed the guilt of the prisoner on Devil's Island, but whose publication would have certainly brought war. He wrote cynically: "Our inadequate semi-Protestant education prevents us from evaluating at its full worth such intellectual and moral nobility. But your mistake, Colonel, will one day be recognized as one of the most magnificent exploits of your record."

These words would have sufficed to dishonor Maurras if at the time he had enjoyed any honor. But he was to remain unknown until the publication in Figaro of his study of the monarchy, and the appearance in 1899 of the first issue of l'Action Française, in which he rabidly attacked Jews, Protestants, Free Masons, and foreigners as conspirators who were plotting the ruin of the French state. At the same time he launched a vigorous campaign against Germanophile pacifism. This brought down on him the anathema of the Pope, and Maurras was not pardoned until 1938 when he recanted and began wildly to praise Mussolini. I defended him at the time of the anathema, and this action cost me my job on the paper where I was then working. I admit now that I was mistaken in believing that Maurras was sincere in advocating his integral nationalism. If, at the time, I had read "Kiel et Tanger," the book in which our excommunicate expressed the belief that it was possible to defeat Germany without the aid of the English, Russians, or even the Italians, I would no doubt have been enlightened. Jules Cambon, the French ambassador to Rome, described the book to Pertinax as "an utter idiocy." An idiocy, to be sure, but today we know that it was also a perfidy.

When Maurras began to sing the praises of Mussolini, it became clear that his new attitude was dictated by extra-political considerations. In Clemenceau's words, "It is the men who have sold out who are most ready to accuse their adversaries of venality." Maurras accused those who backed the Franco-Soviet alliance of being in the pay of Moscow, while he himself was actually in the pay of the Italian and Spanish ambassadors. In 1938 he threatened to use a kitchen knife on the men who supported Herriot's demand for sanctions against Mussolini in the Ethiopian affair. Maurras denounced the subservience of mind to money in his writings; yet he shamelessly accepted money wherever it was to be obtained. His paper, for instance, launched a shrewd and brutal campaign of ridicule against Coty, the perfume manufacturer. Finally Coty decided to buy him off. As they left the manufacturer's office, Maurras turned to his collaborator, George Valois, and said, "He forked over 300,000 francs so easily I'm sorry I didn't ask for more."

Maurras managed finally to quarrel even with the pretender to the throne, the Count of Paris, whose loyal servitor he proclaimed himself. When I dined with the Count in his manor near Brussels, he told me that "some Action Française rascals" were forever badgering him. "They have even tried," he said, "to have me expelled from Belgium because I refuse to yield to their constant threats." "May I quote you, Monsieur?" I asked smilingly. "Are you so anxious to see me dead?" cried my unhappy host.

The French Academy, insulted and ridiculed daily in l'Action Française by Léon Daudet, took its revenge in 1922 when Maurras stood as a candidate. The Forty Immortals rejected him for Jonnart, ex-governor of Algeria and future ambassador to the Vatican. In 1938, however, they were ready to eat humble pie. Cardinal Baudrillard, who was soon to become a collaborationist, campaigned vigorously to assure Maurras a large majority even though the Pope had not yet made his peace with him. With his election high treason insolently took its seat in the Academy.

Recently the newspapers reported that Charles Maurras was gravely ill. Morally he has long been dead. Read what he said to an interviewer the day after the meeting between Hitler and Pétain at which collaboration was initiated.

Are you a supporter of what the Marshal calls collaboration?

I have never been a supporter of it.

Are you an opponent of it?

Not that either.

Neutral?

Not at all.

You accept it then?

There is no need either to accept it or discuss it. Thank heaven, we have left the era of discussion behind us.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

A RECENT happening which merited pages of comment received not a single line's notice in any American newspaper. At the end of April the Deutsche Militärwochenblatt ceased publication. Nowhere in Germany, so far as I can learn, was there any commemorative mention of its passing. Without any fanfare its existence quietly came to an end.

For generations the Militärwochenblatt has been an institution among what may be called the highest German caste, the officer caste. No one could imagine an officer, from a lieutenant to a field marshal, who did not read the Militärwochenblatt. It kept him up to date about the latest developments in doctrine and practice in the military sciences, about military literature at home and abroad, about innovations in foreign armies. It discussed questions of rank and nurtured caste concepts, caste honor, and caste homogeneity. The paper was thus an essential source of officers' esprit de corps. It was a cement, a powerful element in the spiritual and social cohesion of this singularly cohesive caste.

As early as the second year of the Hitler era the Militärwochenblatt began to betray some uneasiness. The Nazis had come to power as the result of an alliance they had formed with a few leading generals. The editors of the Militärwochenblatt saw that the Nazis were gaining more and more the upper hand in this alliance. The Nazis even began to interfere with the officer corps itself. They undertook to control its recruiting, to break up its esprit de corps, to loosen its homogeneity, to transform its character. The publisher of the Militärwochenblatt, a retired General von Wetzell, and especially his chief assistant, a Generalleutnant Marx, became alarmed. They launched in their paper—with all the necessary circumlocutions and verbal concealments—a guerrilla war against the Nazification of the officer corps and the growing influence of the Nazis in military affairs.

They raised the alarm about the deteriorating intellectual quality of the youths who took up an officer's career after leaving school. The education of these young men, they said, was becoming more and more defective. They were not trained in logic or in drawing exact conclusions but in vague approximations and phrase-making. As the year of decision drew near, the paper's editors became more violent against the "loud mouths" who talked of war as if it would be a "triumphant promenade." In the last months of peace Generalleutnant Marx astounded the military profession throughout Europe by a series of sensational articles against certain unnamed gentlemen whom he called the "Panzer fools"—gentlemen who imagined one could win a war against a strong coalition through a temporary superiority in one or two weapons like the tank or the airplane. It is beside the point that the paper's opinion has finally been proved correct after having for a time, in 1941, seemed completely mistaken. What is important is that it presented its views with challenging insistence and supplemented them with scornful jibes at certain, again unnamed, "ignorant amateur strategists," among whom Hitler was plainly meant.

At that time, in 1939, the Nazis met this undeniable opposition in silence. Of course they did not have to put up with it. But the Militärwochenblatt was so closely intertwined with the officer corps that an attack on it was inadvisable. It would have made too much bad blood in a caste that at that precise moment should certainly not be provoked.

The immediate cause of the paper's suppression at the present time is unknown to me. Since the outbreak of war no copy has arrived in America. I do not know what it has said or printed. But certainly it was not defeatist or palpably subversive. The old generals who conducted the paper would not have sinned against patriotism. Besides, if the attitude of the editors had been objectionable in any specific way, it could have been changed without discontinuing the paper. A new board of editors, for example, could have been installed.

One can be fairly certain, therefore, that the Nazis cracked down on the Militärwochenblatt not for retail but for wholesale reasons. And in all probability they destroyed it because it contributed to the cohesion of the officer corps. A body of such homogeneity is a nucleus out of which God knows what can develop. That would be disquieting to a dictatorship. A dictatorship, out of principle, destroys every such nucleus as a preventive measure. This nucleus was particularly disquieting, for it is clear that when the Hitler gang grows weaker nobody will be able to stick a knife in its back with greater ease than a junta of high officers, who have the corps spirit behind them as a reserve. And whether we like it or not, it is as good as certain that such an officers' junta will be formed at the critical moment or perhaps already is in process of formation. The officers will not be checked by any sentimental considerations if they can see a way to get their own caste off unpunished.

Without any doubt the leading Nazis are constantly aware of this threatening possibility. Without doubt they are constantly thinking how they can best protect themselves from it. The task is a difficult one because the corps that later can be so dangerous is at present indispensable. But perhaps progress can be made in disintegrating the caste's instinctive and intellectual cohesion. For years the Nazis have worked to accomplish this in a furious underground war while high officers of the old school have countered and sabotaged their efforts. The Nazis' decision to put through now such a sacrilegious measure as the destruction of the officers' traditional organ is a sign that their nervousness over the potential political threat represented by the corps has increased. They have looked into the faces of generals and colonels and heard some of their talk.

File and Remember

An Eastern Bloc

REACTIONARY Catholic circles are behind a plan to create an Eastern European Federation, supplementing the proposed Catholic Latin bloc in the west of Europe. The eastern bloc, which would include Poles, Greeks, Croats, and Slovenes, apparently bases itself on a mixture of Slavs and Catholics. It would, of course, be anti-Soviet.

Simultaneously with this move, attempts are being made to fade out Dr. Benes and the other Czech leaders. The Czech government, which is proud to have an army fighting in the Soviet Union, has always been firm in its determination to insure full collaboration with Russia. It is therefore the biggest obstacle in the way of the reactionaries who still dream of building a new cordon sanitaire in Eastern Europe.—Reynolds' News (London).

Poland and Russia

It is important to be honest with the Poles. They deserve our honesty. The unthinking courage and the appalling suffering of their common people, their unhappy history, their romantic temperament, and their total lack of political realism—these are factors which command sympathy and which compel all who have to do with them to utter such exasperated remarks as that they are the "Ireland of the Continent." Persecuted nationalism has the same political effects at both ends of the Continent. . . .

Honesty with the Poles should go farther than this. If the United Nations lose this war, Poland will cease to exist; the Nazis have made it clear that they intend in the most literal sense the extermination of the Polish people. Those who are permitted to live will do so as slaves. On the other hand, if the United Nations win the war, Poland can live—and live far better than before—on one condition and on one condition only. That condition is that Poland is on terms of friendship with the Soviet Union. No greater wrong can be done to Poles in Britain or the United States than to pretend that they can have in the future any other security. After the last war the most fantastic claims were put forward by the Poles, and because of their influence in the United States and, in particular, with President Wilson, a settlement that could not be stable and that was ultimately fatal to Poland was imposed by the framers of the Versailles peace. If that settlement was in any sense defensible in 1919, that was because both Germany and Russia were for the time being defeated and helpless, and because the Poles were assured of the full support of the then overwhelmingly powerful French army. The notion of bolstering up the Poles as a permanent barrier against the Soviet Union, on the one side, and as the permanent policeman of Prussia, on the other, was never wise, but, in terms of the power politics of 1919 it was possible as a temporary arrangement. No such settlement is conceivable in the next treaty. The influence of the Soviet Union must be the chief factor in Eastern Europe; and to imagine, as some Poles apparently do, that they can rely on the United States or Great Britain to guarantee their frontiers or maintain their security, if they are at odds with their far more powerful neighbor, is to move politics into the atmosphere of cloud-cuckoo land.—The New Statesman and Nation (London).

A Backward Country!

By Western standards it is a backward country. It does not enjoy the services of an aristocracy steeped in wealth and tradition. It has no rich merchant and finance community to lavish wealth upon its culture. It has been described as un-Christian because it dared to break the influence of an ignorant and reactionary church. In fact, it has little more to boast than common people, peasants, workers, and even a number of bandits, who are all extraordinarily poor according to our standards. They have no Parliament which stands in silent commiseration for the unfortunate victims of Nazi persecution. They have produced no statesmen whose words and promises are quoted the world over and kept nowhere.

This simple republic of Indians and peons has done what not a single one of the great civilized states of America or Europe has been prepared to do. It has thrown open its gates to the Spanish refugees in North Africa without cumbersome requests as to their parentage, means, and intention. This simple act of humanity stands out like a beacon amid the sickening hesitancy of the great nations at war. The Mexican Republic has by its exertions saved many thousands who might have otherwise perished, and by its example it has shown Britain and America how much more valuable is an ounce of action than a conference of pious intention. For this we salute it with gratitude.—The Tribune (London).

Logic

The absence of any properly constituted and recognized council of Allied statesmen has played into the hands of our enemies. . . . If the representatives of the national sovereign states are unable to collaborate under the stress of war, is it likely that they will be anxious to do so in the relaxation of peace? If they cannot create institutions on a cooperative basis to win the war, how can they establish the appropriate machinery to win the peace?—LORD DAVIES in the Contemporary Review (London).

BOOKS and the ARTS

Stefan George

POEMS. By Stefan George. With Translations by Carol North Valhope and Ernst Morwitz. Pantheon Books. $2.75.

TOWARD the turn of the century Germany, Austria, and Bohemia produced a triad of first-rate poets—Rilke, George, and von Hofmannsthal. Their careers ran parallel in more respects than that of time. All three began as "decadents," aesthetic and precious, importing the fin de siècle from France and England and exaggerating it into a pose which lacked, in Dowden's phrase, reality rather than sincerity. All three looked to the post-Baudelairean poetry of France for their models rather than to anything in German; all three were pure poets in the sense that they were interested, in the beginning at least, only in poetry. Their earliest verse was excessively mannered, over-pathetic, and cloying, and strained too much after effect—though exception should be made for von Hofmannsthal, who at seventeen was a fully developed poet and whose work already manifested the perfection of those qualities which in Rilke and George were still liabilities. All three brought to German poetry a new and stricter conception of form, seeking to make their verse more dense and self-contained by the renunciation of explicit content and by emphasis upon symbol, sensuous detail, texture, and feats of technique. Hofmannsthal remained always more or less what he was as a boy; for Rilke and George, however, verse became eventually the means to instead of the end of all other experience. They became saints of poetry, expounding the doctrine that through the poetic consciousness rather than through religion the absolute was to be grasped.

Rilke was without doubt the greatest of the three. Yet while they were all alive George wielded the greater influence; Rilke and von Hofmannsthal were affected by him, but he himself was comparatively little affected by them. George was the center of a cult whose members were so galvanized by his personality and example that they succeeded in making the cult almost popular among cultured Germans. In spite of his own proclaimed and sincere intransigence, the upper strata of German society were ready for him when he appeared, and he penetrated their tastes as no other German poet since Goethe seems to have done. That Friedrich Gundolf, one of George's most ardent and active disciples, was a teacher who had had great influence upon Goebbels—in spite of his being a Jew—and that George himself was a reactionary in every sense except that of his art, these factors are not enough of themselves to explain why the Nazis honored and courted the poet and so estimated his prestige that they have not yet allowed his repudiation of them, as they allowed Thomas Mann's, to become public knowledge in Germany.

George, in a role not unlike that of Oscar Wilde and the Pre-Raphaelites in England, was the first in Germany to prophesy in a loud voice the beautiful as a way of life. He set an example by his own way of life, its décor, his clothes, the format of the books he wrote and of the magazine he published—he even designed their type himself. The beautiful, being the noble, hence the aristocratic, could only be pre-bourgeois. The blight of the trader, the liberal, and the skeptic lay upon our times. The salvation prophesied by George was the kingdom come of a hierarchical, feudal-classical Third Reich led by a new élite which would be brave, courtly, and fair, as equable as ancient Greeks and as fervent as Crusaders. There would be a time of fulfillments, announced by a herald—who was very important in George's scheme; this herald was envisioned as a dazzling ephebe, now a god, now an angel, now a most specific and particular youth addressed as "Maximin," whom George was in love with. The fantasy was composed of elements not so very original either in themselves or in combination, but only in the very personal intensity which George gave them and in the quite absurd egotism with which he identified his own sexual yearnings with the future of society. It was his art and his tone that won him the consideration he received as a sage and oracle. And to consider him in any other light than that of his art is to diminish him.

What of the poetry then? If the distinction may be made, George was more artist than poet; a Parnassian who was a moldier and fashioner of poems rather than a speaker of them; his emotion was more caught up—if another really illegitimate distinction be permitted—by the plastic than the expressive possibilities of language. George's earlier poetry, written under the aegis of symbolism, I now find somewhat disappointing, for all its elegiac splendor and the originality of its rhythms. George was never capable of the long, sustained poem, and here he seems to make too much of a virtue of this shortness of breath. Poem after poem gives only the climax of a mood, the moment exquisite, with no before or after, too soaked in pathos, too static, and too exquisite. There are only cryptic objects, pregnant but uncomplicated details of sight, sound, and smell; and always the dying fall to conclude the poem, with a repetitiousness which is not excused by the truth that George's trochees and dactyls and his use of the feminine ending are almost the most brilliant of all his contributions to poetry—in English as well as in German, since they have reached our language at second hand through the medium of Rilke's influence upon a number of contemporary English poets who read German. The weakness of George's earlier work can be attributed to the fact that symbolist poetry stands under a quantitative limitation. Because of the narrowness of its range of modulation, one can read only so much of it at a time.

Like Rilke, George was over-anxious to become a poet, valuing the vocation inordinately for its own sake. But like Rilke again—and Dante no less—he would not have become so good a poet had not his first swaggering eagerness for the role preceded the consciousness of a mission. George derived his most profound impulses and perceptions from the verbal and rhythmic substance of poetry, that is, from its most tangible medium. Ernst Morwitz, in his introduction to the book at hand, remarks correctly if exaggeratedly of George's later verse that "as in the Greek drama, language is not the means to arouse fantasy; it is an end in itself. The wisdom and the laws of the new life . . . are born from an intrinsic rhythm."

In his later verse George consummates the ideal of the short poem. The climactic moment is now no longer exquisite but magic, and the poem, tightened and made terse by George's masterly renovation of archaic words and syntax, becomes that goal of modern poetry, the spell or charm, something small but of illimitable power. The poetry means nothing except itself, yet works on the nerves and senses as if it were concrete experience entirely, not merely something whose meaning we glean through words. George's practice of poetry abstracted from it everything except its definition or the definition of its prime virtue or greatness. The reviewer happens to have a particular fondness for the slightly longer and more declamatory poems of this period, where a cherished moment of history is evoked and made magnificent again. Here George's breath has a fulness and his matter a reference impossible in the compressed and dateless, placeless purer poetry of the shorter pieces. I think the editors of the present book have included too few of these longer poems.

George possessed a limited stock of simple ideas which he relied upon too unqualifiedly. He wrote some of the greatest poems in any language; yet he missed being a great poet because he lacked roundedness. He did not cope enough with the antipathetic and distasteful; it sufficed him to condemn without examining. Rilke, on the other hand, became a great poet only after having in the "Duineser Elegien" gone as far as he could into dirty, difficult, and definite streets. George invented myths, like Rilke's, animated by sex and history, but they remained too personal; whereas Rilke's self-created myths had enough objective vitality to walk out into the world and receive significations given to them by others than the poet.

The translations in the present book, which includes the originals too, are extremely bad. Whether they are faithful or not is unimportant in the light of their badness. If the original poems were too difficult to permit of adequate English versions, as I am ready to agree, then they should have been put into prose, at whatever sacrifice, but not into this:

Then you, our son, from native stock appeared,
Confronting us in naked glows of god-hood . . .

When bent on brimming seas around me reel
New thunders of the tempest . . .

In torrid frenzy running . . .

A rapid rhythm drove the troops to trotting . . .
And more and more battalions and the selfsame
Stridor of fanfare-tone . . .

You say it is much you took as yours
All I possess . . .

George sometimes let himself go in turgid young-German-romantic visions in the manner of his much-admired Jean Paul Richter, his muse mounting from one iridescent cloudiness to another into regions where not only the mind's eye but the words of any other language than German are unable to follow. But none of the things quoted above are from versions of such poems. The translators lack the excuse even of having had to conform to rhyme schemes, for their renditions of unrhymed poems are as bad as those of the rhymed ones. One merit, however, which cannot be denied Miss Valhope and Mr. Morwitz is that of having elucidated some of the many difficulties of interpretation to be found in George's poetry. They know how to read, if not translate.

CLEMENT GREENBERG

Mr. Cain's Art

THREE OF A KIND. By James M. Cain. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.75.

JAMES M. CAIN, in his preface to "Three of a Kind," insists rather wistfully that he really has no technique, no theory of sock and twisteroo, in spite of what his critics say. He does admit that he sat for a time at the feet of a screen-writing priest of technique who chanted of the "love-rack," the One, the Two, and the Three, the Power of the Prop, the rationing and supplementing of truth. This undergraduate dream, prevalent in Hollywood and correspondence schools, that the carefully laid technique catches the great story instead of the great story catching the technique has defeated other writers besides Mr. Cain. Mr. Cain claims, however, that he has passed that period in his work, and hopes in future to let the "story secrete its own adrenalin" without "needling." He confesses that he used to have such a morbid fear of boring the reader that he got in the habit of needling a story at the least hint of let-down.

The first two of these short novels, Career in C Major and The Embezzler, could do with more needling than they get, for since Cain extracts nothing from characterization or place he requires a constant drum-roll of telling dialogue and action. In the first story a vicious phony with concert aspirations is tamed finally by her infatuated dumb husband on the only terms she can take—namely, he also fails as a singer, so the happy cluck is entitled to return to her and take regular beatings for the rest of his life. Here is Cain's musical obsession again. He seems to feel that the one high-class field open to his never too bright characters is concert-singing. Smart people seldom sing, as the thought processes evidently get in the way of the vocal chords. There is always at least one person with a big diaphragm in every Cain story.

Once having been caught innocently humming in the park (see "Mildred Pierce") or in the parlor (see Career, etc.) by a disguised operatic big shot, they are groomed for the Metropolitan, make the grade in no time, but crack up for other reasons. Leonard Borland, in Career in C Major, got up a whole Reinald Werrenrath repertoire for the Eastman Theater in Rochester during a few months' lull in his contracting business. He's a wow, too, but it's only when his notes sour that his wife takes him back. If this is "needling," I'd rather be bored but convinced.

The Embezzler is quite as easy to read and based on the not too plausible coincidence of a bank investigator helping the teller's wife to cover up the teller's embezzlements. Here again the author uses the first person, a device which he says saved him after years of struggling to write in the third person. In every story, as in previous novels, this "I" is the only character with which he is completely successful, though it is actually always the same man, whether he is bond salesman, truck driver, Acapulco adventurer, or the author. He is always the Mug, this "I," and since he is always portrayed in the first person he can legitimately withhold as much about himself as he cares to, feeding it out in the story chinks not as character development but as plot aids. None of the characters have roots; they are loiterers with no baggage, traveling salesmen to nowhere from nowhere. This prohibits their author the advantages of any drama of man against environment, but does permit him to deal out, as part of the surprise ending, sudden information about their past. In every story the central cast is the same, the Mug ("I"), the Victim, and the Dame; these stock figures are set up methodically and then knocked methodically down by Fate, who happens to be Mr. Cain's bellboy. The Cain women are a trim-ankled lot, varying only as to the colors of their sweaters, but good or bad they push the button for the catastrophe. Either Mr. Cain likes his women spiced with evil, or he was frightened once by the Lorelei; anyway it's the lady's fault every time.

The best story—and the best Cain has done for a long time—is Double Indemnity, an insurance murder story. Here the unfamiliar background of insurance intricacies provides protection against charges of implausibility, just as the Dame's pathological passion for death places her outside any ordinary rules for logical human behavior. The button for catastrophe is pressed when the client's wife casually asks the agent, "Do you handle accident insurance?" The agent is chilled with the conviction that this is the cue for murder, but he offers himself as an accomplice because of lust for her, and knowing all the mysterious machinery of his business it is a gambling challenge to beat it. From then on it has the tempo of fast farce—getting the Dame, getting the Victim, getting the company, getting the other girl, being got by the Dame, and then by the company.

Validity in art is recognized by the after-effect, and the after-effect of a Cain book is a half-angry feeling of having been gypped, of having picked up the April Fool pocket-book or having cried over "Mother Machree." This is not to say that Mr. Cain's art is not important in its own peculiar way, or that it is mere hammock reading. Rather it is something to read in the Iron Virgin, for at its best the intensity of suspense successfully anaesthetizes all other senses and might even induce a trance. This special trick entitles the practitioner to a turban rather than laurels, but very likely Mr. Cain can get along well enough without his greens.

candidates or well-equipped but dull professors. A most ungrateful destiny for such picturesque personalities!

Mrs. Harrison's book on San Martín is almost, but not quite, what an ideal book of this kind should be. She has done a good deal of research in archives and libraries, and at times the reader feels the living presence of the Argentine hero. The chapters that deal with the last days of San Martín in exile—The Hermit of Grand Bourg and Nightfall—are written with feminine tenderness and dramatic force, and are probably the outstanding pages of the book. Mrs. Harrison makes a good deal of San Martín's spirit of sacrifice, especially his yielding to Bolívar's will after the famous interview of Guayaquil. However, this strikes me as a negative quality in a liberator of his magnitude and in his position. One may deduce that if San Martín had met an opponent of Bolívar's character at the beginning of his career as a liberator he might not even have accomplished the independence of Argentina and Chile.

The family life of San Martín—his early days in South America, the influence of his parents over the young boy, the indifference of the soldier toward his young wife, his difficulty in making intimate and long friendships—is sketchily recounted here. The reader feels that he must know more about the man San Martín.

Mrs. Harrison's book is written simply. It is the plain story of San Martín—of his efforts to liberate Argentina, Chile, and Peru from the Spanish yoke, his renunciation, and finally his death abroad.

ARTURO TORRES RIOSECO

How the War Is Fought

WAR EAGLES: THE STORY OF THE EAGLE SQUADRON. By James Saxon Childers. D. Appleton-Century Company. $3.75.

COASTAL COMMAND. British Air Ministry. The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

I SEEK MY PREY IN THE WATERS: THE COASTAL COMMAND AT WAR. By Squadron Leader Tom Dudley-Gordon. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.

AT THE beginning the English almost gave up hope of making efficient aerial fighters out of the Eagle Squadron, the American volunteers who joined the Royal Air Force. The adventure-seeking boys pictured air warfare as it was in the last war and dreamed of becoming famous aces like Foncke, Richthofen, and Rickenbacker. But the art of fighting in the sky had completely changed; the aces of 1918 were like knights of feudal days, as Colonel Childers points out, and just as the knight had become lost in mass troop movements, so the individual pilot had become part of a mass aerial formation. Little by little it was beaten into the boys' heads that they had to fight as a team and that the pilot who darted out of formation to pursue what looked like an easy prey not only was risking his own neck but also was imperiling his fellows. Death eliminated the wild individualists. The boys who were able to learn the intricate skills of modern team fighting finally made the Eagle Squadron into a highly valuable arm of the R. A. F. It is now in the American air force.

The British estimate that it costs about $125,000 to train a fighter pilot. He has to learn to twist and weave through the air to present a minimum target to flak gunners. He has to learn to shoot while diving at 600 miles an hour. He has to learn not to shoot until he is within 200 yards of the enemy plane and then to fire only for a second or two; his cannon are capable of firing for a total of six seconds, and his machine-guns for only sixteen seconds. He has to learn to see; on one of the Eagle Squadron's first flights they were attacked by some Messerschmitts and a battle was fought; but when they landed, four of the pilots who had been looking the other way at the moment did not even know there had been a battle. Even the most experienced pilot is said to see only 7 or 8 per cent of what goes on in an aerial fight; things happen too fast for the quickest eye.

Having been a naval aviator in the last war, Colonel Childers was well able to appreciate these problems. His book is not only a lively chronicle of the Eagle Squadron but also an excellent introduction to the complex art of present-day warfare in the sky. The Colonel tells about the various types of tasks which fighter pilots must undertake, from the small-scale harassing operations to the great intrusive sweeps involving scores of fighters and bombers. He tells how pilots are briefed for their jobs, and reproduces conversations and commands that passed over the radio telephones while the planes were in action. The Colonel gathered much of his material from the pilots themselves, and also had access to the official records of the squadron.

In addition to such lore, Colonel Childers has good stories to tell about the Eagles, who were not exactly a demure lot. Among the more unpredictable of the boys was Leo Nomis, an Indian who worshiped guns. There came a long dull stretch in which he had no opportunity to fire at a Jerry. Flying along on monotonous convoy patrol one day, he could stand it no longer; he just had to find out whether his guns were working right. He sighted fifty feet above the right wing of the Eagle ahead of him, and blazed away. Amazed imprecations came over the radio phone from the pilot ahead, and Leo answered: "What the hell's the matter? I'm missing you, ain't I?"

Five million square miles of ocean from Iceland to equatorial Africa are the province of Coastal Command, that semi-autonomous section of Britain's Royal Air Force whose task is to patrol the seas and shores. It uses land planes and sea-planes; it fights with mines, torpedoes, and depth charges as well as with bombs and guns. It was Coastal Command that tracked down the Bismarck; it was a Coastal Command plane that had the unique distinction of capturing a submarine and its crew at sea. When Russia entered the war it was Coastal Command that flew the ferry service to Archangel.

The book "Coastal Command" is the British Air Ministry's official account of the war role of that branch. The author's name is not given, but he was Hilary A. St. George Saunders, whom the government employed to tell the public how the war was being fought. His books have had enormous sales in England, and his latest, "Combined Operations," also without his name, is a Book-of-the-Month selection in this country. Mr. Saunders has come over to give Elmer Davis some ideas; this is good, for England has succeeded in letting the people in on the war to a much greater extent than we have. After all, the war is not the exclusive property of the High Command, as some of our admirals and generals seem to think.

"Coastal Command" tells the story with quiet competence. There are nearly 200 pictures in the book, a superb collection. English readers, who know an Albacore from a Skua as well as we know a Cadillac from a Chevrolet, no doubt find the authoritative details fascinating. Americans may find "I Seek My Prey in the Waters" a more entertaining version. This book was written by three British newspapermen who served as public-relations officers, and covers much the same ground as the Air Ministry account but in a more chatty, anecdotal style. For instance, they tell about the time a British submarine started to dive, taking no chance that the Coastal Command plane overhead would mistake it for a German, an easy thing to do. But the bomber, having duly recognized it, flashed a light signal: "T-W-E-R-P." "Why?" asked the submarine. "British," said the plane. The amused submarine commander reported this exchange; some dull official made the pilot of the plane write an apology to the submarine for insulting it. The captain wrote back to the pilot saying he didn't mean to stir up a fuss, except that he thought it should have been spelled "T-W-I-R-P." MARCUS DUFFIELD

Opera for the Listener

MORE STORIES OF FAMOUS OPERAS. By Ernest Newman. Alfred A. Knopf. $4.

THE object of this book, says Newman, is "to help the listener to opera, whether in the theater or by radio, to get more value out of his listening."

An opera begins by being a stage play; and one of the things Newman does in his book is to describe the dramatic action of each opera. He describes it in sufficient detail to make his summary a helpful guide to the person in the opera house, but a less adequate guide to the radio listener, who does not see where the characters stand, what they do, which one addresses which, and who therefore needs the guidance of the complete text. A person using this text of "Der Rosenkavalier" will get a great deal of detail that Newman omits, most of it unimportant, but one line—the Princess's exclamation to her hairdresser: "Today you have made an old woman of me"—a key line for what happens in the rest of the first act.

An opera carries on its dramatic action with the help of music; and there are many things in the music that the opera-goer should know but is likely not to know, says Newman. Of all the people who have heard "Der Rosenkavalier" how many, he wonders, "have paid any particular attention to the little figure quoted as No. 2a in the following analysis? I do not mean when motive No. 2 is first heard as a whole in the orchestral prelude to the opera—no one can fail to be aware of it there—but some forty or fifty bars later, when it appears, in the condensed form of no more than just these three notes, as a counterpart to another theme. And even if the listener's attention does happen to have been caught by this fragment, how is he to know that Strauss has marked it 'seufzend,' thereby telling the student of the score in the plainest terms possible that he is expected to hear in it the sigh of the Princess over the love that she is soon to lose forever?" These are things which he must be told, and which, apparently, Newman will tell him; but actually Newman tells him very few of them: he describes long stretches of action without pointing out the recurrence, in the service of this action, of the themes he has quoted. For that matter he describes long stretches of action without even quoting important themes the first time. And where he does mention a detail he ignores the problem of correlating word with actual sound: one cannot merely mention details scattered through the work and expect the listener to catch them; one must point them out to him; and in a book the only way to do this is to direct him to the particular measures in the score, or to the particular places on records. The opera-goer can get the knowledge of the music and of its relation to the action that Newman says he should have by going through the score at the piano or with records; but he will not get it from this book.

Newman also thinks the opera-goer should know how the opera happened to be written, what its dramatic sources were, how this dramatic material was adapted and used. Some of his material of this kind is interesting—for example, the account of how the original conception of "Der Rosenkavalier" changed in the process of being realized. Some of it is a great and unnecessary to-do about very little—for example, the ten pages devoted to the changing details of the unimportant German and French comedies that were the basis for the libretto of "Die Fledermaus." What produces this also produces the to-do about the dramatic weakness, in "Boris Godunov," in the fact that the Czarevitch is on the stage during Boris's monologue and "is allowed to listen to his father's confession of the murder of the child," but that in the later scene with Shuisky Boris sends the Czarevitch from the room "to keep from his son the terrible truth of his guilt in the matter of the murder of Dmitri, after he himself had laid it bare to him in [the] earlier scene!" Newman is too excited about his own brilliant perception to see that Boris's monologue in the earlier scene is addressed only to us, and tells us only his thoughts, and is therefore not heard by the Czarevitch (he makes the same mistake about Boris's first phrases in the Coronation Scene). And I have rarely seen pompousness sling phrases around with more confusion and less sense than in the discussion of the original and Rimsky-Korsakov versions of "Boris Godunov."

The operas which Newman discusses include some of the standard works; there are also some which we are not likely to hear in our lifetime—on the one hand a great work like Berlioz's "Trojans," on the other hand things like Cornelius's "Barber of Bagdad"; but "Salome" is omitted, though it is part of the standard repertory and is as important as "Elektra" and "Der Rosenkavalier" and is more important than "The Barber of Bagdad."

Newman is a critic with powers of insight and intellect that one is bound to respect and admire, but also with weaknesses—one of them being his own admiration of his powers and their works, which causes even his good writing to have an odor of ostentatiousness and pompousness, and which makes even the substance of some of his writings very bad. This book has both good and bad in it; and even with faults and deficiencies that limit its usefulness it is probably the best of its kind.

B. H. HAGGIN

Fiction in Review

PERHAPS not in a class with Mickey Mouse or Donald Duck, but in a class, say, with Andy Hardy, Rose Franken's Claudia is one of America's current minor institutions. At the age of twenty-five Claudia is the heroine of countless stories in the women's magazines, of a Broadway hit, of a radio serial, and of a trilogy of novels. The latest novel is called, simply, "Another Claudia" (Farrar and Rinehart, $2.50); according to its jacket, "what Mark Twain did for the small-town American Boy, Rose Franken has done for the American Wife," and I think the comparison is not unfair. For just as a potential Huckleberry Finn lies hidden in even the most progressive-school little boy, I suspect that a potential Claudia lurks beneath the surface of the least Claudia-like of American women, ready to spring out if given the chance. Usually it isn't given the chance, any more than the youngsters of my acquaintance would be allowed to come within a block of Nigger Jim, let alone expose themselves to gripe and athlete's foot by going without shoes. Nevertheless, Huck is part of the American dream of boyhood, and when the children I know come of age, they will no doubt try to give the dream a wistful semblance of reality; and just so Claudia is the wishful dream of American wifehood. If the young matron who reads "Claudia" is no Claudia herself, she could wish to be, and as she grows old she may even persuade herself, wistfully, that that's the way things really were when she was young.

For no woman wants to grow up—and here is Claudia a perpetual child yet enjoying all the privileges of maturity. Who could be better loved than Claudia by her David, and who could be more charming or prettier and yet so unburdened by the responsibilities of either brains or beauty? This is indeed the stuff that dreams are made of. Claudia is a baby herself but the mother of two children, a wife but a mistress, a dimwit but married to a man who is the soul of competence and earns a fine living: surely Miss Franken has mined a rich vein of female fantasy. It is true, of course, that book by book Claudia must grow older, but how gently time lays its hand upon her and how lightly Claudia skips from under its touch! It is the "realism" of the Claudia stories that their author recognizes that too much immaturity is not entirely desirable in a grown woman and regularly provides Claudia with a fresh calamity to age her—Claudia's mother dies of cancer, a third baby miscarries, Claudia has a nervous breakdown; still, what to a bigger person would be a knockout blow is for Claudia merely a new occasion to exhibit the wonderful resilience of childhood.

The important thing about Claudia is that she is so modern. In Miss Franken's heroine Hemingway has seeped down into the women's magazines: Claudia is a Connecticut Catherine Barkley. Gallant and sophisticated, she scorns cliché and sentiment; she can listen to four-letter words without a blush, and she talks about going to bed like a charming little hussy. But, actually, scratch the surface of Claudia's gallantry and you find a clinging vine; scratch the smart surface of her language and you uncover the eternal clichés of folk-wisdom: Claudia's values are compounded of "feed the brute," "all men are little boys grown up," and "the hand that rocks the cradle rules the world." As for her sexual sophistication, there was that revealing moment at the play "Claudia" when a wandering gentleman thought Claudia knew what she was up to when she put on that lipstick and those pajamas; first David had to sock the guy, then explain that his wife was a sexual infant!

But perhaps even more significant than Claudia's relation with her husband is her relation with her servants and children—so modern, too, and so practical. Some of Claudia's best friends are her maids: she understands that servants are human, understands it so well, in fact, that the current Jane or whatever her name is, plans the meals, does all the cooking, bathes and dresses the children, mends, sees that the children have haircuts, and does all the cleaning without any visible help from Claudia. Or in her role of mother Claudia understands what a mistake it is to sacrifice one's husband to one's children. Claudia makes no such mistake: she sacrifices her children to anything, including the dogs. The new brittleness in child-rearing one might call the principle on which Claudia brings up her boys—the reaction to the reaction which, only so few years ago, was teaching us that children needed love.

Indeed, all along the line this is the nature of Claudia's modernity—reaction to reaction. According to how you look at it, then, Miss Franken's creation is either one step ahead of the game or a cultural lag. For instance, it is 1942, but Claudia, whose husband is about to go to war, makes it adorably feminine to be ignorant of geography and politics, and to be cute about insurance. When she backs the car into the garage, ripping off the door, deep in her heart she knows it will only make David love her the more—it makes men feel so superior that women are awful drivers. Claudia even avoids the beauty parlor except in extremis because men prefer their women "natural." Is there no length to which some women won't go to sell out their sex?

And yet I enjoyed reading "Another Claudia" much more than I've enjoyed many more serious novels. The writing is simple and adequate. If there isn't much action, there is a good substitute for action, the sense of something doing every moment and every page full of the recognizable details of day-to-day living. And after all, so few writers have anything to add to life, it is rather a relief to read someone who makes no pretense to doing more than reflect it.

I certainly mean it as no comment on either of them that I follow Rose Franken with Nancy Hale. As a woman-specialist, Miss Hale is obviously a bird of a different feather; and although I didn't understand what she was trying to say about our sex in "The Prodigal Women," I do know she was trying to say something quite complicated and quite in another direction from the author of Claudia. Now Miss Hale has a collection of short stories, "Between the Dark and the Daylight" (Scribner's, $2.50), which I am glad to report are not only eminently understandable but move out of the women's dormitory into the world. Some of the pieces—Odd Fellows' Hall is an example—are mood-pieces and self-conscious in the manner of the fashionable short story, but these are in the minority. Miss Hale's distinction is her ability to cast into personal human terms her intense moral, even political, indignation; and when she is hitting her stride, as in Those Are As Brothers or The Marching Feet, she is writing very good short fiction.

DIANA TRILLING

FILMS

AS CINEMA and as warfare, "Mission to Moscow" is an important piece. Not entirely without skill, it inaugurates for a great general audience a kind of pamphleteering and of at least nominal non-fiction whose responsibilities, whose powers for good or evil, enlightenment or deceit, are appalling; and of which we are likely to get a great deal from now on. (Walter Huston touring Mr. Willkie's One World seems like a foregone conclusion.) This first film is likely to hasten and intensify our cooperation with the Soviet Union. It may even help frustrate those who—if my naive impression is correct—plan to win this particular peace by destroying the Soviet Union, dominating Europe with the help of Bryn Mawr graduates and domesticated democrats, and reducing China to an Anglo-American-owned, Japanese-policed laundry. To whatever degree the film may help frustrate such intentions, and enrich our alliance, I feel considerable passion in its favor. It will be the first time that moving pictures have even flexed their muscles in a human crisis. Aside from these purely practical issues, however, the picture fascinates me chiefly as a phenomenon. So does the question how it came to be made in the first place.

There are other questions. Did the government urge the film on Warner Brothers? Is it federally subsidized or lend-lease? Are the sacred treatment of the President and the adroit suggestion that all isolationists were Republicans parts of a deal or mere good-will? We can only suspect, through rumor and internal inference, that the Stalinists here stole or were handed such a march that the film is almost describable as the first Soviet production to come from a major American studio. Almost, but not quite. For it is indeed, as Manny Farber has well said, a mishmash: of Stalinism with New Dealism with Hollywoodism with journalism with opportunism with shaky experimentalism with mesmerism with onanism, all mosaicked into a remarkable portrait of what the makers of the film think that the American public should think the Soviet Union is like—a great glad two-million-dollar bowl of canned borscht, eminently approvable by the Institute of Good Housekeeping.

As such, it is as rich a subject for diagnosis as any other dream.

Up to a point—not far short of first base—it is serviceable. It is good to see the conservatives of this country, Great Britain, France, and Poland named even for a fraction of their responsibility for this war. It is good to see the Soviet Union shown as the one nation during the past decade which not only understood fascism but desired to destroy it, and which not only desired peace but had some ideas how it might be preserved and how it would otherwise inevitably be lost. It is good for that matter to hear even an oblique line spoken in favor of Basic English—a line by the way which underlines the rumor that Madame Litvinov played a strong hand behind-screen.

But that is about as much good as I can find, barring some sincere performances and some rather inchoate directorial nervous energy. The rest is shameful rot. Not that "Mission to Moscow" is either remarkably more true or more false than the characteristic reflexes of Hollywood, the press, the schools, the politicians, or civilization in general: simply, it indulges the all but universal custom of using only so much of the truth as may be convenient and of regarding aesthetic integrity, human verisimilitude, and psychological credibility as scullions, dismissible without notice if employable at all. This sort of irresponsibility is insulting and inimical to its producers, appraisers, and consumers alike, and those who accept or excuse it insult and endanger themselves still again, from within. The immediate incidental pragmatic effect may be good. But the deeper effect is shame, grief, anaesthesia, the ruin of faith and conscience and the roots of intelligence; and the real end, as should be reasonably clear just now, is disaster.

Letting that be for the moment, what are some examples?

Mr. Davies himself is one in his prologue, indorsing the gospel truth of this production—a figure as much of dream as of reality. As a big business man, the figure which has replaced Lincoln as the American archetype, he is a creature whose wisdom, disinterest, reliability are final and above question.

The man whom Ambassador Huston faithfully calls "Boss" is another. Boss is here accorded almost the divine invisibility of "good taste" which Jesus Christ rated in Fred Niblo's "Ben Hur," where a Mazda bulb stood in for the Nazarene; and his voice, even in intimate conversation with Joe, sounds as if he were telling a hundred and thirty million of his friends that we planned it that way.

Ambassador Huston is still another, as he carries his honest Tarkingtonian charm around brightest Russia, Seeing for Himself with an Open Mind. He sees little of the colossal country and the astonishing people Warner Brothers might at least have half tried to let him see. But Davies himself didn't see either, actually. He saw what ambassadors, officials see; and the film shows him doing just that, no more. This is one of the most faithful notes in the film, really. What little Mr. Huston does see, however, will be mighty illuminating to those fifty million-odd moviegoers who have never had his advantages. For there is no essential difference, it turns out, between the Soviet Union and the good old U. S. A., except that in Russia everybody affects a Weber and Fields accent and women run locomotives and you get tailed by a pair of harmless comics who claim to be GPU men. The Ambassador learns this sort of good news in a series of dialogues on that "educational" radio level in which a mere scientist asks a Pasteur, "Just what is this H₂O, Doctor Coffee-Nerves?" and gets a wrong answer. Mrs. Davies and Madame Molotov, meanwhile, put on a woman's-page skit with a serving maid which makes Elinor Ames' "The Correct Thing" look like the correct thing. Later, at a "history"-making reception, two cellovoiced Soviet officials stroll past the camera with the most endearing Daisy Ashfordism in years. Commissar Cox opines, "We are entering a new era, don't you think so?" Commissar Box retaliates, feelingly, "I think we have done remarkably well!"

About the trials I am not qualified to speak. On surface falsifications of fact and atmosphere I might, but on the one crucial question, whether Trotsky and Trotskyists were or were not involved with Germany and Japan in a plot to overthrow the government and to partition the country, I am capable of no sensible opinion. I neither believe it nor disbelieve it. I neither believe nor disbelieve evidence to the contrary. I am unable to trust the politicians of either camp or of any other to supply me, the world in general, or even their closest associates, with the truth. I am unable to be sure, even, that men of such intelligence, courage, and integrity as Professor Dewey are undecivable in such matters, deeply as I respect them; so I am unable, in turn, to be convinced by their findings and opinions. It may be that this painful impotence is an impotence merely of my own spirit; it may be that I am immobilized, rather, by my conviction that a primary capacity for telling or discovering the truth is possible, today, to few human beings in few types of occupation or allegiance. In any case I can attempt to learn the truth, and can defend, or attack, only in areas where I can rely in some small degree on the hope of emergent truthfulness in the material and in those who are handling it.

JAMES AGEE

ART

HENRY MOORE. At the Buchholz Gallery, 32 East Fifty-seventh Street, until May 29.

One would have expected Henry Moore's drawings to be good, knowing his sculpture, but who could have imagined how wonderful they would be, how delicate the color and the line! One of the few things that can be said for this war is that it has forced him to draw; he found he was unable to get either the materials or the proper surroundings in which to do his sculptures. He has such sponsors as Herbert Read and Sir Kenneth Clark and well he deserves them. But even they find it difficult to give any idea of the beauty and importance of his pictures.

MAX ERNST. At Julien Levy, 42 East Fifty-seventh Street, until May 21.

Max Ernst's current show lacks evidence of his usually fertile imagination. The pictures are monotonously repetitious, and their smooth tubular shapes somehow suggest that they should be sold under the counter like rubber goods. But to make up for it he is also showing some of his charming collages. This exhibition is to celebrate a book "Misfortunes of the Immortals" by Max Ernst and Paul Eluard, translated by Hugh Chisholm (and very well translated), and published by the Black Sun Press. The illustrations are witty but the text dates sadly.

HERBERT MATTER: PHOTOGRAPHY. At the Pierre Matisse Gallery, 41 East Fifty-seventh Street, until May 15.

Some of these items are straightforward photographs, some are surrealist in spirit, and some a mixture of the two, but all are excellent—clear, direct, and with a sense of poetry to ensnare the onlooker. There are two attractive montages as well, but Mr. Matter's real talent is for photography, and of his photographs the ones that are surrealist in feeling are the most dazzling.

JEAN CONNOLLY

RECORDS

THE most important recording on Columbia's May list is the one of Beethoven's Quartet Op. 127 made by the Budapest Quartet (Set 537, $5.78). Sullivan, in his marvelously perceptive chapter on Beethoven's last quartets, says almost nothing of this one; but what he says of the group as a whole and of the others in particular is true of Op. 127. In the slow movement, which is the greatest of the work, we encounter the "remote spiritual content" of the group, the "strange seas of thought" in which Beethoven "discovered unsuspected islands and even continents." Not in the wonderful opening theme, which is as direct and clear in emotional implications as it is in structure; but suddenly in the first variation, where the implied meaning is as involved as the texture and structure, as strange and elusive at times as the harmonic progressions in the sixth measure, the dislocated rhythms in the seventh, and where this meaning finally attains the remote exaltation that is conveyed in some other slow movements of the group. And also in the third and fifth variations. And the other movements of Op. 127 are suffused with the "gay melancholy" that Sullivan speaks of in connection with the alla tedesca movement of Op. 130—with intimations of the pain communicated by Op. 132.

The work has been available recently only in a characteristically heavy-footed and pedantic performance on Victor records by the Busch Quartet. The Budapest Quartet's performance in the new Columbia set is one of the finest I have heard from this group; and the records reproduce its marvelous inflections very well but make it sound cold, hard, and at times even harsh—which the real sound of the Budapest Quartet is not.

Also on Columbia's May list is Borodin's Symphony No. 2 performed by Mitropoulos with the Minneapolis Symphony (Set 528, $4.73). The work remains, for me, tunelessly inconsequential; but the performance is surprisingly good, and the sound of it on the records is clear, agreeable, and normal. Then there are "Ah! fors'è lui" from Verdi's "La Traviata," well sung by Bidd Sayao (71451-D, $1.05), and "Udite, udite, o rustici" from Donizetti's "L'Elisir d'Amore," amusingly done by Baccaloni (71383-D, $1.05)—and I say "done" rather than "sung" because of Baccaloni's extensive use of parlando. The orchestral accompaniments conducted by Leinsdorf are a little too unobtrusive; and one must wonder why Columbia isn't able to record performances by the New York Philharmonic as well as it records these accompaniments.

Columbia's May record classic offers one of the finest works of this century, Prokofiev's Violin Concerto No. 1, and a superb performance by Szigeti with the London Philharmonic under Beecham that is excellently recorded (Set 244, $3.26).

Take the music of a Richard Rodgers song by itself, and it has a sort of dead-pan simplicity and innocence; take it with the lyric, and as a phrase of music rounds itself out with the line one hears the witty point of the words being underlined by the music, which only then reveals the unsuspected wicked force packed in behind the dead-pan, innocent simplicity. Such music and choreography like Agnes de Mille's, with its own extravagances bursting out of innocences, are beautifully suited to each other; and the dances in "Oklahoma" are delightful. I must confess, however, that seeing them for the first and only time I was sometimes confused—once by not knowing from the song or from anything else what was being made fun of in the funny dance to "Many a New Day"; later by the contradictory humorous and tragic elements in the dream ballet. It may be Miss de Mille who at the most serious moment cannot resist the impulse to deliver a kick in the pants; or it may be the contradictions in the libretto—for example, the smoke house scene, with the humor of the duet "Pore Jud" interrupting the literally deadly serious conflict between Curly and Jud—that are carried into the ballet (not having seen "Green Grow the Lilacs" I don't know whether there were these contradictions in the original play, or whether they got in as the play was reduced to a typical musical comedy libretto).

Most of the issues of the little magazine Dance Index have dealt with matters of interest only to specialists. But the issue of September-October-November 1942 was devoted to excerpts from the writings of Carl Van Vechten which included two long pieces on the Diaghilev Ballet Russe and Nijinsky that I found extremely perceptive and illuminating. And the issue of March 1943 was devoted to photographs of Nijinsky, with accompanying notes by Edwin Denby pointing out more of the exciting things in them than a non-professional eye would see alone. Letters to the Editors

Bicycle View

Dear Sirs: I was pleased to receive the first number I have seen of The Nation. I wonder how many I am to receive for the dollar I sent? I will soon know whether I can afford to give the time to read it. I skimmed over the articles, intending to read them later, but I went for the letters to the editor and read them carefully. Do editors know that these are the most valuable pages of their publications? They tell what the people are thinking, those who are on the spot. Their conclusions may err but their facts must be considered.

Now the accomplished writer makes a living by thinking up stuff and putting it in smart words like the young preacher who must, at least three times a week, make up a sermon. He makes it up mostly out of his books or out of his head. But what I saw in a twenty-mile ride on my bicycle today you could not extract at a rolltop desk in New York.

For example, in that twenty miles I did not see one farm worker or any farmers working. About five miles from here there is a farm where other years we bought all sorts of vegetables and strawberries. I asked the owner the other day why not this year as always. He said, "I was uncertain about getting help." He is raising a few carrots and beets this year. When I saw him gathering carrots some time ago, he and his wife and four colored women were at work. It meant six workers and a trip to Tampa—forty miles.

Some time ago I saw eight people planting tomato plants on the farm down the other road. It was the third planting. The farmer depended on the work of his wife and three daughters and had also employed a man for the day. The skilled farm hand told me privately that he would not do it another day, that he "could not stand it," that is, the bending down and sticking in the plants all day. The girls seemed to be having a good time on their day out of school.

On the road I took today there is an extensive dahlia farm. It is bigger than the other two farms. One sees whole carloads of the big baskets for the express car of the Shore Line every day.

And take this in—almost any part of the land I passed through could raise anything we want from chickens to strawberries. New land would not pay the first year. The work would have to be directed and planned and the labor paid for. Part of the pay would have to come from the government.

There are plenty of well-to-do people in the communities. They would have to be directed. We need not call it drafted. Plenty would be willing if asked; and then many are just satisfied to work on unessential jobs, like the able colored man I met on the way home. He was growling about his work—I suppose he gets little more than his food. He said he works at the saloon cleaning up and washing dishes.

Fischer and Culbertson

Dear Sirs: Mr. Fischer's article in a recent issue of The Nation was an able (and very devastating) criticism of Ely Culbertson's plan for post-war world organization. His attack on the details of the plan, particularly those features which he believes would tend to perpetuate imperialism and the colonial system, is able and convincing. Unfortunately he fails to notice any of the good features of the plan, or to offer any constructive criticism.

Certainly some sort of world federation is necessary, and Mr. Culbertson cannot be damned for suggesting one in concrete terms. Regional organization is almost inherent in such a federation, or at the very least is an alternative worth considering.

If there is to be a world police force at all, is there any alternative to something like the "quota-force system" which Mr. Culbertson suggests? Call it anything you like, but any international force will have to be recruited in some such manner. Mr. Fischer hints here at the alternative of general disarmament, but I am afraid that this is even more "unrealistic" and improbable than anything Mr. Culbertson suggests.

The real value of Mr. Culbertson's plan, however, has been missed entirely. Here is something presented in sufficiently concrete and detailed form, and sufficiently well publicized, to stimulate discussion of the problems involved by many people, including such qualified experts as Mr. Fischer himself. It is all very well to talk vaguely of world organization and a world police force, but here is something that gets us all down to "brass tacks" and a little thinking about the concrete problems and difficulties involved.

The most disappointing feature of Mr. Fischer's article is, of course, his failure to suggest alternatives. (One is tempted here to offer this as a general criticism of many contributions to The Nation.) Mr. Culbertson has been very careful to emphasize that he is offering his plan as a basis for discussion, and not as a finished product. As such, it will be of value only if it brings forth constructive comment.

Mr. Fischer's article certainly calls for a sequel discussing his own ideas on post-war organization.

C. FAYETTE TAYLOR

Cambridge, Mass., April 27

Dear Sirs: My article grew out of a review of Culbertson's pamphlet, and while I saw my way clear to criticizing what Culbertson wrote I did not think I was called upon to suggest alternatives.

Some day, perhaps, I will write the sequel and discuss my own ideas on post-war organization.

Meanwhile I think that destructive criticism of harmful proposals is a constructive thing to do. In defense of The Nation I should add that it is often constructive. LOUIS FISCHER

New York, May 3

Those Baltic States

Dear Sirs: In one of his recent speeches Wendell Willkie reminded: "After the last war was over, I saw our bright dreams disappear, our stirring slogans become the jest of the cynical." The ably expressed ideas of Vassili Soukhomline's article, Russia's Baltic Frontier, in The Nation of March 27, go far toward preparing similar disillusiones for future Willkies.

It is fashionable to treat the millennial German Drang nach Osten as something reprehensible. The equally millennial Russian Drang toward what Peter the Great called okno v Evropu (a window on Europe) should receive the same treatment, since both these Drangs trample on the natural rights of the small nations which had the historical misfortune to settle the shores of the Baltic before the Germans or the Russians got there. Both Drangs go against the spirit of the Atlantic Charter.

Mr. Soukhomline asserts that "not only strategic but vital economic and political reasons urged Russia toward the shores of the Baltic." Why stop at the Baltic? Why not go on toward the Atlantic Ocean, toward Denmark and Norway? The happy exponent of the traditional Russian imperialistic urge says, "Before the First World War 32 per cent of Russia's foreign trade went through the Baltic ports" (it is not clear whether Leningrad is included). However, in a letter to the New York Times the Latvian Minister in Washington wrote on March 23: "On August 11, 1920, Soviet Russia signed a peace treaty with Latvia and recognized forever Latvia's independence. Latvia granted to Soviet Russia full transit possibilities, over railroads, waterways, and harbors, and even lowered local tariffs for Soviet transit goods. Soviet Russia did not use these facilities. Maybe there was nothing to export, maybe it was a certain Soviet policy."

If Soviet Russia could get along very well for eighteen years without the warm-water ports of Latvia, it would seem reasonable to presume that it could just as well get along without them, say, for another eighteen hundred years.

Mr. Soukhomline then fits another string into the imperialistic bow: "There is no doubt the Allies would never have thought of separating the Baltic provinces from Russia [in 1918] had not Russia been temporarily weakened by war and revolution." Very true, but "thoughts" are not always in accord with the facts of life and justice. There was a time when the British Crown did not think of letting the American colonies separate and become independent. There is reason to believe that the British do not think of letting India go the whole way toward independence. There was a time when another group of Allies thought to smother the ideas of the French Revolution. Does Mr. Soukhomline wish to argue that a nation, small or large, has no right to strive for political independence and freedom just because somebody "thinks" otherwise?

Mr. Soukhomline winds up his ably written imperialistic argument with a historical misstatement and the salve of a "social revolution." "It was Germany," he says, "that took the initiative in creating the Baltic states." It is excusable for a Russian who has left behind him the social revolution he so lightly wishes on the Baltic populations not to know the history of Lithuanian, Latvian, and Estonian independence movements, which have deep roots in these nations' history. Mr. Soukhomline is sadly misinformed when he declares, "As a matter of fact, Germany proclaimed the 'independence' of Lithuania on February 16, 1918."

As a matter of real fact, this proclamation was made by a Lithuanian Taryba (Council) of twenty members elected by a Congress of Lithuanian delegates from the thirty-three German-occupied districts of Lithuania. This Congress was held in Vilnius on September 17-23, 1917, and 230 delegates participated. The proclamation was against the wishes of the German military government, which was angling for a personal union with the King of Prussia. This declaration by the Taryba was immediately approved by a Congress of Lithuanian War Refugees in Russia held in Petrograd and by a Congress of American Lithuanians held in Madison Square Garden, March 13, 1918. This declaration coincided with the wishes of the Lithuanian nation.

The salve of "social revolution" adduced by Mr. Soukhomline as one of blessings of the Russian Drang toward the Baltic fools nobody. The plain fact is that the Lithuanians had their social revolution: an intelligent land reform duly devised by a democratically elected and free parliament working through regularly constituted political parties and leaders. This happened 'way back in 1923. The Lithuanians are a peasant, Catholic nation with a distinctly Western outlook and a very strong and thriving cooperative movement. They want none of the Bolshevik revolution or its methods. The same goes for the Latvians and the Estonians.

Since the Nazi aggression against Lithuania in 1939, when the port of Klaipeda (Memel) and the $20,000,000 worth of improvements were seized by Hitler, the government of Lithuania has been a coalition of members of all Lithuanian parties with the tacit support of the Social Democrats. Its only "fascist" symbol was the President, still in office after a putsch by military officers in 1926. This putsch had the ostensible aim of counteracting an expected Bolshevik move against the political integrity of Lithuania—a move similar to the one that failed in Estonia.

If the Baltic republics fail to regain their hard-won independence after this war, it will not be on account of any of the arguments of Russian imperialism, so ably set forth by Mr. Soukhomline.

The Lithuanians, the Latvians, and the Estonians will lose their independence by the simple principle of might is right. Must we applaud this in advance, presumably upon the great liberal principle of "the greatest happiness of the greatest number," because Soviet Russia has 190,000,000 people, the Baltic republics only 5,000,000?

The problem is by no means an easy one, but a true liberal, it would seem, should strive to work for an international order where might could not override the natural rights of smaller nations.

The Baltic peoples place their hopes in the United States. In fact, the hopes of many other peoples are placed there, also. These hopes may turn sour. The United States may repudiate the principles of the Atlantic Charter as it repudiated the Wilsonian idealism expressed in the League of Nations. If that should happen, then the "nascent Soviet nationalism," as Professor Karpovich calls it, will accomplish the work which czarist imperialism strove to do in the Baltic region from 1795 on, that is, to Russianize the non-Slav Baltic populations. The millennial Russian Drang will then be complete, and three more small nations will have been choked by a bigger one.

Exception

Dear Sirs: The people who live in the mining communities of southern West Virginia are certainly disappointed in the article appearing in your magazine under date of April 3—Why They Follow John L. Lewis, by Selden C. Menefee. I dare say that Mr. Menefee may have found a particular case covering any item mentioned in this article, but these cases would be the exception rather than the general rule.

While touring the city of New York in an automobile a few years ago, I was shocked at the existing living conditions in the largest city in the world, where all the modern conveniences were available and ready for use. As I saw these conditions, I thought how fortunate the employees and their families were who had the opportunity of living in rural mining communities where they could have a yard in which the children could play, a garden for raising vegetables, playgrounds for the children during the summer months, modern schools, churches, and other advantages.

Let the People Know

Dear Sirs: I simply must write you about Miss Kirchwey's article, While the Jews Die, in The Nation of March 13. For the first time over here I have found someone who gives words to my feelings about this question. Long, long ago I irritated many good friends by saying to them, "You as well as I are guilty. Why do we not do anything? Why are we going on with life, knowing what is happening over there?" People got angry. Some called it hysteria. Others told me that I believed all the lies people brought to me. You see I lived in Denmark on a little island rather close to Germany. Therefore many refugees came to me. One told the other, and I had space to shelter many. I saw them. I heard them. I know. Yet at that time—before Hitler went into Denmark—it was not as it is now. Then it was only single individuals who were tortured, not the wholesale slaughter of today.

I always had my best friends among the Jews, all over the world. I am in great debt to the Jews; they have done more for me than my "own race." And sometimes I feel as if I would go crazy, not being able to do a thing. Over here, believe it or not, people refuse to hear too much about these murders. Of course it is because everyone, deep inside, feels his own guilt and so tries, through silence, to suppress the sting.

I was in Madison Square Garden at the Mourning Festival. And for me it was terrible to sit surrounded by countless gay young Jewish girls, as happy as if they were at a party. I do believe that what the people here need, in order to be aroused, is to have persons with authority like you tell them again and again and again what is going on.

Let me give an example of what could be done. Long ago, at the beginning of this century, when the Armenian murders were at their height, our Danish Grand Old Man, Georg Brandes, delivered a lecture upon this subject. He began by asking the women to leave the room. They did not leave. Then he said: "Well, you stay on your own responsibility!"

He opened his lecture by saying, "I know that it would not make the slightest impression upon you if I described how tens of thousands have been massacred in the most cruel way. Therefore I will tell you only about one single case, one single family, that was exterminated." He spoke, and to right and left women dropped, fainting. I was not there, but friends told me the next day.

I wish that the ministers every Sunday would tell about one single case. Let the people faint. Let them! But let them never lull themselves into believing that they have done all that they could do.

The Shape of Things

PRESIDENT WILLIAM GREEN IS REPORTED TO have grinned happily when announcing that John L. Lewis had applied on behalf of the United Mine Workers for reaffiliation with the A. F. of L. But on second thought he seems to have recollected the old story of "the young lady of Riga, who smiling rode out on a tiger." He has not accepted the tempting down payment which Lewis offered but has appointed a committee of three to study the miners' application. Two members of this committee, Daniel J. Tobin and George W. Harrison, are New Dealers and likely to scrutinize Lewis's intentions and credentials with some severity. The third, Matthew Woll, is believed to tag along with William Hutcheson, Lewis's strongest supporter inside the A. F. of L. Formal barriers to readmission of the U. M. W. are not especially formidable. It would be opposed by the Progressive Mine Workers of America on the ground that affiliation would violate its charter rights, but this is only a small union, and some means of compromising its claims would probably be found if the Federation really wanted Lewis back. Another obstacle is the Lewis commando—District 50—organized to raid any union where the pickings promised to be good. Its strength lies not in its members but in its nuisance value, and it would no doubt be sacrificed by its leader—at a price. ✕

BUT IN DEALING WITH JOHN L. LEWIS IT IS the intangibles that need careful weighing. Not only trade-union but national politics are involved in his desire to return to the fold. The addition of the U. M. W., with its 600,000 members and its large war chest, to the A. F. of L. would certainly increase the latter's strength and prestige and relatively reduce the bargaining power of the C. I. O. in any future merger negotiations. However, once Lewis with his totalitarian ideas of unity was reestablished in the councils of the Federation, there would be little hope of bringing the two labor organizations together at all. Instead, we should expect to see efforts to wean the C. I. O.'s strongest units from it one by one. Politically there is no question that Lewis would seek to involve the A. F. of L. in his feud with Mr. Roosevelt and to swing it away from the New Deal. No doubt this move would be camouflaged as a revival of the "traditional" labor non-partisan policy, but it would put Lewis in a position to bargain with the Republicans and to exert an influence on next year's G. O. P. Presidential convention. Of course, there is no guaranty that Lewis will be able to deliver in 1944 the votes he will claim to represent, any more than he did in 1940, but it must be recognized that the Administration has been losing ground in labor circles owing to its continued appeasement of business. With the war being run by business men—and often, it appears, for business men—labor is feeling increasingly uneasy about the Washington set-up. If the miners win a substantial increase in wages—and there are indications that a formula is being prepared to allow just that—rank-and-file trade unionists are apt to feel that the merits of a big-stick policy have been demonstrated. Thus Lewis will be able to knock at the A. F. of L. door with redoubled assurance.

IT MAY BE TAKEN FOR GRANTED THAT THE House of Representatives will vote to abolish the poll tax in elections for federal office. A substantial majority of both houses favors abolition, and the move can be defeated only by a filibuster. Since this device for imposing the will of the few on a helpless majority is forbidden in the lower house, champions of the poll tax are already turning for salvation to the Senate, which came to their rescue last year. Representative Hobbs of Alabama calls the abolition bill an invitation to Congress to "forget its oath of office" and hints darkly that it might prevent the Senate from "functioning for a long period of time." "Blackmail" is the word for this delicate approach to legislation. A country that tolerates no work stoppages in industry should make matters uncomfortable for political strikers who would paralyze the Senate of the United States in war time.

GREAT EMPHASIS WAS PLACED BY WINSTON Churchill in his speech to Congress on the increasing weight of the Allied aerial assault on Germany and Italy, and he gave some encouragement to the strategic school of thought which holds that the Axis can be bombed out of the war. Admitting that opinion was divided on this question he went on to say: "The experiment is well worth trying, so long as other measures are not excluded." And, indeed, the method is now being tried on a scale never attempted before. Month by month the R. A. F. and the American Eighth Air Force have been dropping a heavier weight of bombs on German Europe and there is no doubt that as a result German production has been appreciably diminished. However, as Donald Mitchell points out on another page, there is no definite evidence that German morale has been seriously affected, while the comparative immunity of eastern Germany from raiding is a limiting factor in knocking out the Nazi economy. No doubt the Germans will experience worse visitations yet; but a knockout from the air still seems many rounds ahead. Meanwhile an aerial campaign, apparently designed to soften up the Italian islands, is being waged from our newly won bases in Tunisia. Concentrating on ports and airfields, the Anglo-American fliers have been most successful in forcing the Axis pilots to come out and fight. In five days, for instance, 305 enemy planes were destroyed at a cost of 18 Allied planes. This suggests that our superiority is being established, and it may not be very long before the "other measures" of which Mr. Churchill spoke are exemplified in the Mediterranean arena.

GENERALS DE GAULLE AND GIRAUD HAVE at last reached an agreement in principle, and with their meeting in Algiers the reintegration of the resisting French forces should be well under way. Their first task will be the organization of an executive committee which will act as the central authority until France is liberated. It is agreed that the two generals will preside in turn over the executive committee, whose responsibility is to be collective. Each will select two other members, and three more will later be chosen by the whole committee. Much will depend on these selections, and some difficulty may be foreseen in naming the ninth member, who will in effect cast a decisive vote. It is to be hoped, however, that as the committee buckles down to its tasks the dividing line between De Gaullist and Giraudist will gradually disappear. In several respects De Gaulle's patience—his opponents call it obstinacy—has been thoroughly justified. The colonial governors are to be excluded from the committee and relegated to their proper role as superior civil servants. Further, Giraud has agreed to the proposal for the institution of a consultative to guide the executive authority on French opinion. If truly representative, such a committee will obviously exercise an important anti-fascist influence.

THE FOOD CONFERENCE, NOW IN ITS SECOND week, appears to be turning up the inevitable sharp variations in national opinion. Some of the differences that have arisen have their origin in the as yet unexplained decision to hold a conference on long-range food problems before the immediate questions of feeding the post-war world are considered. The delegates from Russia and most other parts of Europe can scarcely be blamed for wanting to make sure where next year's food is coming from before giving thought to long-range agricultural policies. Once this hurdle has been cleared, however, the British food plan, submitted by Richard Law, stands as a model of constructive post-war thinking. The British wish to abolish once and for all the philosophy of scarcity as a basis of world economic relations and to substitute a program designed to bring about the utmost production and the most widespread distribution of essential food. To this end a variation of Vice-President Wallace's "ever-normal-granary" plan is proposed, together with subsidized distribution by such devices as communal meals, school lunches, and the vitamin enrichment of staple foods. The plan recognizes, moreover, that "hunger and malnutrition are . . . symptoms of the more deep-rooted disease of poverty" and that "squalor and bad housing . . . prevent progress in nutrition even where the right foodstuffs are distributed." It therefore urges that the study of food and agricultural problems include reference to such wider economic problems as monetary arrangements, commercial policy, and the future of international investments. At first sight, this proposal may seem like an effort to blunt the effectiveness of the conference by unduly widening its scope. But basically the British delegation is right. The details of post-war policies cannot be discussed in isolation. A beginning must be made while the war still rages to draw up in broad outline the nature of the post-war world.

THE DEATH OF ADMIRAL YAMAMOTO removes America's most implacable foe among the small coterie of Japanese militarists responsible for the war. His boast that he would dictate the terms of peace at the White House was not that of an empty braggart. Yamamoto possessed great abilities. He is credited with planning the attack on Pearl Harbor and with developing the strategy that led to the sinking of the Repulse and the Prince of Wales. He was regarded as the chief exponent of air power in the Japanese navy, and under his supervision the naval air force was developed much more successfully than the air branch of the army. The dominant force in Yamamoto's life, according to those who knew him, was hatred of the white race, particularly of the United States and Great Britain. Nearly thirty years ago, according to Willard Price, he attributed his decision to join the navy to a desire "to return Commodore Perry's visit." Yamamoto's death will not, of course, affect Japanese war policy. There are at least a dozen other leading Japanese militarists who are filled with the same all-consuming hatred of the United States. But it is doubtful whether the Japanese have another naval leader who can begin to fill his boots.

HEARINGS ON THE REPEAL OF THE CHINESE Exclusion Act have been started by the House Immigration and Naturalization Committee. From a quantitative standpoint the proposal may seem unimportant. If, as is proposed, the Chinese were granted full equality with other nations under the quota system, only about 100 persons could be admitted in the course of a single year. Possibly 20,000 Chinese now in this country would become eligible for citizenship should they desire it. These numbers are insignificant as compared either with the population of the United States or with that of China. But the removal of the sixty-one-year-old discrimination against the Chinese at this time would be of immense value in building United Nations unity. The Chinese have long attached considerable significance to the restrictions as a symbol of outmoded ideas of white supremacy and Oriental inferiority. This feeling has undoubtedly aggravated the Chinese suspicion that our "beat Hitler first" policy was at bottom another example of anti-Oriental bias. Such suspicions could be exploded overnight by placing the Chinese in a position of full equality in our laws. And, incidentally, such action would destroy the propaganda value of Japan's pretense that this is a "white man's war" to enslave the peoples of Asia.

FOR THE COLLECTOR OF ODDITIES IN THE news, last week provided a better than average crop. From Tokyo came proof that though a prophet may be without honor in his own country he can count on plenty of honor from his country's enemies provided he is, like Colonel McCormick, the right kind of prophet. The Colonel's campaign for deepening Anglo-American friendship by conferring statehood on England, Scotland, Wales, and the British dominions brought him nothing closer to honor than a horse laugh until word of it reached Japan. There recognition was instant and went out over the short wave: "Robert McCormick is an extremely charming character. America today needs many more characters like this Chicago veteran. There is the possibility that other influential newspapers such as the New York Daily News and the Washington Times-Herald also may join the campaign, and they will have tremendous influence over the reading public." . . . Happily timed with the visit of President Benes comes word that the famous "Hapsburg Legion" is no more. Several months ago the War Department reluctantly abandoned its experiment of forcibly making "Free Austrian" legionnaires out of Czechs, Serbs, and other natives of what was once the hated Hapsburg Empire. As a result, it now finds it impossible "to obtain sufficient personnel of the qualifications necessary" to form a battalion, the "Emperor's" call to arms notwithstanding. . . . To Martin Dies the dissolution of the Comintern means the end of a task well done. "I believe it will enable us to wind up our work at an early date," says Mr. Dies, obviously too tired after five years' work on Comintern agents to shift his attention to those of the Anti-Comintern. . . . Double talk distilled to a fine art is heard from Rome, where Virginio Gayda puts the innocent question: "What are the terms Washington and London might be prepared to offer us in exchange for unconditional surrender?"

Churchill and Chandler

SENATOR CHANDLER has some reputation as a swimmer—or at least as the recipient of a gift pool which occasioned some political debate—but when he dives into global strategy he immediately gets out of his depth. Last week, applauded and egged on by the old isolationist crowd, he told the Senate that we should no longer regard the defeat of Germany as our first objective but should turn all our forces against Japan, recognizing it as the "chief enemy of the American people." This is a legitimate, if debatable, proposal, but the arguments which the Senator used to support his case not only showed a feeble grasp of strategic principles but a complete political irresponsibility.

We must, he declared, attack Japan first because after Germany has been defeated we can count on neither Russia nor Britain to aid us in the Far East. Accusing the former of an unfriendly act in making the recent fisheries agreement with Japan, he suggested that once the Russians had freed their soil of Nazis they would be perfectly content to settle down peacefully while we battled the Japanese. Moreover, while we were thus occupied, Moscow would dictate a settlement of Europe which would be unacceptable to the United States. At the same time he accused Britain of maintaining a large idle army in India and doing nothing to force open the Burma road and bring aid to China.

Senator Chandler claims to be a realist, but it is a curious kind of realism that not merely publicly questions the good faith of our two chief allies but ignores the fact that both of them have a very large stake in the Far East and the suppression of Japanese imperialism. We can imagine, then, that this Senatorial intervention must have caused as much dismay in London and Moscow as it occasioned pleasure in Berlin. To be sure, the senior Senator from Kentucky is not an outstanding figure in Congress, but since he is a member of the Military Affairs Committee our allies may attach some weight to his words. Moreover, as I. F. Stone reports on another page, he and his friends have assiduously spread the impression that his speech reflected the opinions of the General Staff. It is so unbecoming, to put it mildly, for high officers to use lobby methods to bring pressure on their commander-in-chief that we should prefer to believe Walter Lippmann's explanation "that Senator Chandler had heard and was repeating odds and ends of military gossip and theorizing."

It is difficult to imagine, for instance, what general would be willing to back the Senator's dictum that, with the North African campaign successfully concluded, Germany is put completely on the defensive and could not possibly knock out either Britain or Russia. That may be true if we follow up the Allied victory in Tunisia, but should we lose the momentum which that victory has given us and sit down for a long-distance siege of Fortress Europe we should soon forfeit the initiative. For, as the Senator is apparently unaware, practically every military expert agrees that the German army is still an immensely powerful weapon, and if its full weight were thrown against Russia, as it could be if we assumed a passive attitude in the west, a disastrous defeat of the Red Army would be by no means impossible.

In his powerful and illuminating address to Congress, which was in part a reply to Chandler, Prime Minister Churchill declared: "In the conferences in January, 1942, between the President and myself and between our high expert advisers, it was evident that while the defeat of Japan would not mean the defeat of Germany, the defeat of Germany would infallibly mean the ruin of Japan." The Senator does not agree because he does not realize that the essential factor in the defeat of Japan will be sea power (including sea-borne air power). Until we can put an overwhelming naval force in the Pacific and Indian oceans, we can only attack the periphery of the ill-gotten Japanese empire. If such a force were available, the reconquest of Burma would not be long delayed, for then a landing could be made near Rangoon and the Indian army would be freed of the almost insuperable problem in logistics offered by the mountains and jungles of western Burma.

With the defeat of the Axis in Europe the day will come when the British navy will be released from its vigils in the North Atlantic and the Mediterranean and joined to the United States navy. Then we shall be able to challenge the bulwark of Japan's power—its battle fleet—with a superiority of force that will be irresistible. Then we can cut the communications without which an island empire must soon wither and die. That is why the defeat of Germany will "infallibly mean the ruin of Japan."

It does not follow that the advocates of a "Hitler first" strategy are content to pursue a purely defensive policy in the Pacific. As The Nation has frequently pointed out, it is highly important to strengthen China, particularly in the air, and to interfere as much as possible with Japan's efforts to exploit its conquests. Our forces in the Pacific are constantly engaged in harassing the enemy, and there is reason to believe that resources will soon be provided to enable the scale of these efforts to be magnified. Certainly every step taken toward freeing the Mediterranean enlarges the prospects of reinforcing the Far East.

But Europe is and should remain the primary front unless our national policy is to be set by a handful of politicians and military men who would like to see both Russia and Britain exhausted by a war of attrition. This is not the policy of the President nor, we believe, of the great majority of the American people. For they realize the essential truth of Winston Churchill's warning of the grave danger of unduly prolonging the war. "No one can tell," he said, "what new complications and perils might arise in four or five more years of war, and it is in the dragging out of war at enormous expense till the democracies are tired or bored or split that the main hopes of Germany and Japan must now reside." It is on speeches like that of Senator Chandler's that such hopes prosper.

The House Disgraces Itself

THE issues involved in the Lovett, Watson, and Dodd cases go to the very root of our system of government, and the whole affair, unless properly resolved, points in the direction of an un-American America of which we should all be ashamed. We wish that every American could read the statement made by Secretary of the Interior Harold L. Ickes to the Senate Appropriations Committee in defense of Robert Morss Lovett. Few public officials, in these disgraceful days of reaction at Washington, have had the courage to speak out against the attempt to force the discharge without trial of government employees by legislative fiat. None has more ably and forcefully presented the basic questions involved.

When the House, by a vote of 317 to 62, voted these three men out of their jobs, it showed more ignorance and contempt for the principles of our government than any supposed revolutionary. The "purge" rider attached to an urgent war appropriation bill violates the principle of separation of powers. The Fathers in the first Congress recognized—and the Supreme Court has upheld their view—that Congress cannot remove an employee of the executive without interfering with a co-ordinate branch of the government. To brand a man as subversive and discharge him from office by legislative vote is to act by bill of attainder, a process made hateful by despotism and specifically forbidden by the Constitution. The Supreme Court, in a famous case, explained why. In so condemning a man, the court said, "the legislative body . . . exercises the power and office of judge . . . it pronounces upon the guilt of the party without any of the forms or safeguards of trial."

The accuracy of that description is attested to by the proceedings against Lovett. Lovett was examined by the Kerr committee for two hours on a day's notice. "He had no detailed specifications of the charges against him," Secretary Ickes said. "He had no counsel." The Department of the Interior was not even permitted to send its solicitor as an observer. No transcript was made available afterward to Lovett, to the department which employs him, or even to the Congressmen who voted his discharge.

"A man under our Constitution," Secretary Ickes told the Senate committee, "is entitled to counsel when tried even for minor criminal offenses. . . . Here the charge, subversive activity against our government in time of war, is far more serious. The penalty, a reflection upon the man's good name and the loss of his livelihood, is far greater. The issues, involving the balance of the whole of his past life, are far more complicated. Yet the Kerr committee not only denied the right of counsel but conducted its interrogation in a secret session, the transcript of which is still unavailable. This, I submit, is not the American way to do things. This indeed is 'un-American' activity."

As professor of English literature, as editor, as critic, as public official, and as an anti-fascist, Lovett commands our deepest respect; his life and record need no defense against ignorant and bigoted men. One may only note in passing that the man who was for twenty years president of the League for Industrial Democracy, an organization continuously under attack by the Communists, has now been branded "communistic." More important is the semblance of legality given to the proceedings by the Kerr committee's claim that six of the organizations to which Lovett belonged were found "within the scope of Public Law 135 and Public Law 644 by the Department of Justice." But the Attorney General, in response to an inquiry from Secretary Ickes, explains that these organizations, though branded as "front" groups, "were not regarded as 'subversive.'" They were not so regarded, the Attorney General said, because their programs "were legitimate and frequently commendable on their face," and because they "attracted the membership or participation of large numbers of persons who were animated by liberal and patriotic purposes." It is a pity Mr. Biddle did not explain this a long time ago to the FBI and the Civil Service Commission.

The most shocking thing in this whole shocking affair is that a great and good American like Lovett, who lost his only son in the last war, should be hounded and smeared on the testimony of two of the most unsavory witnesses the Kerr and Dies committees could have found. One is Elizabeth Dilling, now under indictment for sedition; the other is Walter Steele, a professional peddler of anti-Semitic and fascist propaganda. Steele's organizations, Secretary Ickes said, "have been on the regular mailing lists of the German propaganda machine, and are officered or indorsed by men such as Arya and Sanctuary, now under indictment for sedition. These are the people used by the Kerr committee to brand as disloyal a patriotic American citizen."

We look to the Senate in the Lovett, Watson, and Dodd cases not so much to right a wrong as to reestablish American principles and wipe out the shame all Americans must feel at the action of the House. We applaud such conservatives as Hobbs of Alabama for their brave stand in defense of these men. And we condemn both the Democratic and Republican leaderships in the House for adding the last final un-American touch to this whole un-American affair by allocating to the defenders of Lovett, Watson, and Dodd only twelve minutes out of the two hours assigned to the debate, and permitting only two of them, Hobbs and Marcantonio, to speak.

End of the Comintern

BY FRED A. KIRCHWEY

STALIN'S dissolution of the Third International was an act of political war—and it is in these terms that it must be judged. Whatever its secondary purposes or effects may be, and they are both intricate and far-reaching, its primary object was to direct an offensive blow against Hitler's one remaining political weapon—exploitation of the fear of Communist revolution.

This weapon was double-edged; it was employed with equal effect in Nazi-controlled Europe and in the ranks of the Allies. The fact that even in the United States one could find honest and misguided patriots whose fears of bolshevism were strong enough to dilute their hatred of Nazism, gave Hitler's anti-Comintern propaganda a continuing value. We have only to recall the antics of Dies and his fellow witch-hunters, dramatized just this past week in the unbelievable attack on Robert Morris Lovett, to recognize how effective the weapon still is. The fanatic excesses of the Dieses and Kerrs may be taken as symbols of that pervasive dread of revolution which, ever since Hitler's rise to power, has corrupted and weakened the foreign policy of all the major powers, and which continues to divide the anti-Axis forces even in the midst of a worldwide struggle for survival.

And if the fear of Moscow has tended to paralyze the allies of Moscow, it has undoubtedly been still more effective in rallying the depleted and frightened forces of reaction in Europe. Hitler's dream of world dominion has evaporated in North Africa, on the eastern front, in the face of imminent invasion in the west. Only Fortress Europe remained—and the dread of Communist revolution in the wake of Allied victory. This was Hitler's one surviving story, and he had every reason to try to stick to it; the old weapon had served him well from the day of his first street brawl to the present hour of decision.

Stalin, with a single stroke, has taken it from his hand. Nothing is left to the German Propaganda Ministry but empty cries of "fake" and "trickery"—cries which sound peculiarly hollow emerging from the best-equipped fake factory in Europe.

As important as the disintegration of Axis morale is the strengthening of Allied unity. The immediate response of the anti-Axis powers has been warm approval and an assumption that closer military and political co-operation will be a certain result. Again we may adopt the convenient Martin Dies as a guide to the minds of more sober and important men. Mr. Dies, informed of the action taken in Moscow, immediately announced his intention to wind up the affairs of his Committee on Un-American Activities. This was more than an ingenuous admission that the activities of the committee—as liberals always charged and as Mr. Dies always denied—have been directed against those labeled Communist rather than against fascists. Mr. Dies's reaction to the announcement from Moscow revealed the degree to which prevailing suspicions of Russia have been tied up with existence of the international Communist organization whose ostensible purpose—however it may have deviated from it in practice—was world revolution. The formal wiping out of that body, together with the explicit repudiation of its aims, will undoubtedly dissipate most of the fears that have infected government agencies, from foreign office to the least important legislative committee, in every Allied country.

It is beside the point to argue that the fears were groundless, that the Comintern in 1935 shelved its revolutionary objectives in favor of a people's front against fascist aggression—a short-range program aimed at the prevention of war and the defense of Russia. It is even beside the point that Russia has for the same reasons opposed revolution in every country where it threatened. All this is true. But public officials are seldom either highly informed or courageous. They are more impressed by appearances than facts. If the Comintern has become a ghost of its former revolutionary self, Nazi propaganda has armed it to the teeth and turned it into a specter calculated to frighten the timid and superstitious. By his gesture of exorcism Stalin has made possible a unity in program and action which would never have been achieved as long as the ghost walked.

Whether his move will serve equally well to unify the forces of the left is more questionable. The factional schisms which have split the labor movement and the ranks of political radicalism are deep. They will not be healed overnight. Indeed, for the workers in all countries the Moscow decision opens as many questions as it settles, questions which demand the most detailed and honest analysis. The perspectives of possible change in relationships and political strategy are almost unlimited. They will be discussed in these pages from week to week in all their important aspects. For the moment they are of secondary significance. The world is at war. The primary consideration is not the future of the Communist parties or their relations with other radical groups, or even the possible rise of new revolutionary alignments. The job in hand is to cement the Allied powers in a tough, durable, aggressive union, to infuse it with all the progressive vision and energy available, and to drive through to victory and a decent peace. Viewed in this light Stalin's act is above criticism.

General Marshall Should Explain

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, May 24

THE best clue to the difficulties with which the President has to contend, and likewise the best clue to the drift of discussion at Anglo-American staff conferences, lies in the "beat Japan first" debate in the Senate. Senator Chandler's speeches on that occasion and over the air the next day leave the impression (1) that General George C. Marshall, the army chief of staff, disagrees with the strategy of his commander-in-chief, the President, and (2) that he disagrees so strongly as to forget his duty as a soldier and encourage attacks in Congress upon his commander-in-chief. I am only saying publicly what many informed people here are saying privately. What is being said is a natural conclusion for anyone to draw who read last Monday's Congressional Record or heard Senator Chandler's radio speech. If what Chandler and his Senatorial allies said gives a false impression of what General Marshall and his colleagues on the General Staff are thinking, the General can easily correct that impression and clear himself. He is a very fine and likable man, but he has acquired some strange friends in the Senate, and they have succeeded in making him appear insubordinate. This is a grave charge, and I hope the General can show that it is unfounded.

The facts are these: The President and the Prime Minister, in a global war that has forced the most unfortunate dispersion of our forces, have decided that it is best to concentrate as much as possible on the European theater first. That choice is dictated by military and political necessities. We cannot defeat both Germany and Japan at the very same time. Should Germany defeat Russia or force a separate peace on Moscow, and thus be free to hurl the Wehrmacht west, we should pay with many additional years of struggle and many additional lives for that disaster. Should the Soviets feel that we and the British were disposed to fight this war on Wimp's principle—"let's you and him fight"—they would surely seek some way out, if not in a separate peace, then in an undeclared truce.

That fundamental decision was made some time ago. The Prime Minister comes to Washington for a military conference with the President and their respective military and naval advisers to implement that decision. While they confer, an attack is made in the Senate on that fundamental decision. A group of Senators speak up for the strategy of "beat Japan first." The main speech is made by Chandler of Kentucky. He is supported by Wheeler, Tydings, Shipstead, Vandenberg, Clark of Missouri, Bridges, and Brooks. No one questions their right to speak, though much of what they said was made to order for the propaganda Goebbels beams at Moscow. Most of them are associated with isolationist and appeasement policies, and some of them have been much more critical of the Russians and the British than they have been of the Germans. They speak as though by concert, and they are full of mysterious intimations that they speak for General Marshall and also Admiral King. Chandler says he was "encouraged" to make his speech. He says he is voicing not only his own feelings "but the feeling of quite a number of military and naval men." Tydings offers to retract what he has said "if General Marshall and Admiral King believe it is wise to do what is now being done." The day after the debate Chandler goes on the air, praises General Marshall, expresses the hope that Marshall will "continue to direct the military policies of our government," and says it would be "a serious blow to our people if anything happened that would deprive the people of this country of his valuable services as chief of the General Staff." Does Chandler think Marshall might be removed for appealing over the head of his commander-in-chief?

Churchill answers some of the questions raised in the Senate debate. Oddly enough, he praises "the wisdom of the founders of the American Constitution," for making the President the commander-in-chief. Churchill points out how remarkable it is that 150 years later "this combination of political and military authority has been found necessary not only in the United States, but in the case of Marshal Stalin in Russia and of Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek in China." Churchill says dryly that even he, as majority leader of the Commons, has been drawn "from time to time . . . into some participation in military affairs." Why did Churchill feel it necessary to discuss this basic constitutional question?

The "beat Japan first" bloc intimated that the President was not taking the advice of his military and naval leaders. One may pause a moment and recall that it was General Marshall who held a press conference soon after June 22, 1941, and gave out the authoritative opinion that it would take Hitler only a couple of months to clean up the Red Army. Other instances of military and naval miscalculation—Pearl Harborism—have not been unknown in recent years. But if one reads the Congressional Record carefully one will see that the basic objection of the "beat Japan first" group and the military-naval men for whom it speaks is not military but political. The fear expressed is that if we help the Russians and the British to defeat the Germans, they will be too strong to accept our dictation at the peace conference; they will "divide Europe between them." These Senators, many of them isolationists, one or two not unsympathetic to German aims in the past, who thought Hitler's conquests no affair of ours, are now afraid that Russia may want to control—the Bosphorus! This is old-fashioned imperialist politics, not military strategy. The General Staff, which still has plenty to learn about military matters, has been dabbling in politics, domestic and foreign.

Obviously there are the most dangerous tendencies at work here. The first is our oldest and most deadly enemy, complacency. The assumption is that Hitler has been defeated, though he lost but 15 divisions in Tunisia and still has 218 on the Russian front. The second is callousness. We can safely leave the Russians to do the job, and bleed to death in the process. The third is the red bogey—why not let Hitler destroy communism for us? (This once also impressed Chamberlain and Dal-dier.) The fourth is the persistent belief that a war can somehow be won without fighting; once we thought we could draw a ring around Japan and now we think we can draw a ring around Germany, and win by a leisurely combination of bombing and blockade. "I have reason to believe," Chandler said, "that the American fighting men in all services would rather make it a war of attrition." We shall be hearing more of this "war of attrition." It corresponds to the wishes of some in the big-business crowd, as does much of the politics in this "beat Japan first" strategy. Two weeks ago the president of a great radio company explained to his stockholders that he would be able to resume civilian production a few months after the end of the war. But, said he, if we decided to wage "a war of attrition," civilian production might be resumed before the war was over. Some people visualize "a war of attrition" as a much less costly affair in men, money, and materials, a war which can be waged on part time, as it were, while we turn our attention to more profitable pursuits.

What Americans Think

BY SELDEN C. MENEFFEE

THE people of America are fighting this war wholeheartedly. Most of them would like to fight it harder, if they knew how to go about it. They are far ahead of the Administration both in willingness to sacrifice and in their desire to take positive action now toward setting up an international organization to prevent future wars. I make these assertions after talking with thousands of Americans in all walks of life during a recent 15,000-mile trip through every section of the country. And my impressions are borne out by such fragmentary data as are available from public-opinion polls—the Gallup and Fortune polls and those of the National Opinion Research Center in Denver and the Office of Public Opinion Research at Princeton.

Easterners are apt to assume that "out in the sticks they don't even know there's a war on." The fact is that people in the small towns have a greater personal stake in the war than city folk. Families are larger; everyone knows everyone else; the whole community keeps tabs on its boys at the front. When a Lawrenceville, Georgia, boy is wounded by the Japanese somewhere in the South Pacific, the whole town buzzes with excitement. And when an outstanding high-school athlete of Spirit Lake, Iowa, turns up missing in North Africa, all Iowa parents are concerned about his safety.

The South is the most belligerent region, now as before the war, though its fighting spirit is dampened on the home front by bickering over the racial issue and by the political attacks of Southern Democrats on the Administration. Strongly Catholic areas in the East have mixed feelings about the war because of their deeply ingrained antipathy to Russia. But in both regions the people generally are solidly behind the war effort.

The West is bound up heart and soul in the war in the Pacific. The emotional impact of the Pearl Harbor attack, followed by the invasion of the outer Aleutians, the bombing of Dutch Harbor, and the scattered shelling of West Coast points by Japanese submarines a year ago, produced an acute awareness of the danger from Japan. In addition, the boom in shipbuilding and aircraft production and the shortages of farm labor and foods have brought about drastic economic changes on the Coast.

The Middle West seems much less directly concerned with the war. There is a qualitative rather than a quantitative difference. Isolationism in its pre-war sense has disappeared here almost as completely as elsewhere in the country, but the war seems somehow distant: the lights are on, black markets are prevalent, and business goes on pretty much as usual except that it has shifted to war production. Though the polls do not show that the Middle West differs much from other large regions in its attitude toward the war, I was conscious of less emotional fervor and more complacency.

Signs of the "new isolationism" are also most in evidence there. This is the protective war-time coloration assumed by diehard isolationists. The necessity of winning the war is never questioned—opposition is indirect and appears mainly in these four forms:

1. An unwillingness to consider possible plans for the post-war world at this time. There is sniping at Willkie, Wallace, and other exponents of post-war internationalism. "The government is trying to railroad us into some new League of Nations," a Wisconsin school teacher told me. "Why should we worry about a quart of milk for every Hottentot?" He was one of many Middle Westerners taken in by the false interpretation of Wallace's speech spread by the National Association of Manufacturers. The corollary to this attitude is a tendency to criticize virtually every Administration act and policy.

2. Distrust of our Allies, particularly Russia. Whenever the Red Army wins a spectacular victory, the Chicago Tribune and its satellites raise the bogey of Russia as a dangerous enemy in the post-war world.

3. A new imperialism, which stresses the necessity of (a) dominating the Western Hemisphere, (b) holding the military bases we have rented or borrowed for the duration of the war, (c) acquiring new bases, especially in the South Pacific and Southeast Asia, and (d) placing full reliance on a powerful American navy and air force, which will supposedly enable us to preserve the peace by dominating the entire world.

4. A potential willingness to appease the enemy, based on the view that our real enemies in Europe are Hitler and the top Nazi leaders rather than the whole German military machine.

These views are held by only a minority of the people—probably far less than 25 per cent—even in the most isolationist sections of the Middle West. But the minority is highly vocal, and through its press it is capable of producing doubt and confusion in the minds of a much larger number.

Strangely enough, Minnesota, Wisconsin, and the strongly Republican Plains States are apparently less susceptible to these influences than the East Central States—Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and Michigan. The opinion polls have shown less division in the first section not only on the question of pre-war isolationism but also, more recently, on whether Russia can be trusted after the war and whether the United Nations should set up an international police force to preserve the peace. In Minnesota the sharp trend of opinion away from isolationism in any form is symbolized by the tremendous popular support given to Governor Harold Stassen. Stassen's advocacy of a United Nations government and Senator Ball's effort to put the Senate on record in favor of an international police force have been acclaimed by Minnesotans of all political parties, including many Farmer-Laborites.

I found almost no evidence of anti-Semitism in the Northwest and West Central States. Except in Minneapolis no one considered it to be a serious problem. The well-worn anecdote to the effect that the first American soldier to set foot on overseas territory was an Irishman but the first American business man to get a defense contract was a Jew turned up in several places, but no one took it seriously. The most telling comment was that of an Omaha social worker who said, "Why look for anti-Semitism out here? When I was in New York and Washington last summer I was shocked by the anti-Jewish talk I heard. I'd never heard anything like it in these parts." In the country as a whole the National Opinion Research Center found early this year that nearly half the people thought the Jews had "too much influence in the business world."

The American people do not question the necessity of fighting this war through to the end. Not one in ten favors seeking an early peace through some sort of compromise. Nevertheless, only two-thirds claim to have a clear idea of what we are fighting for. This is an improvement over the early months of the war, when only half of us had a fair notion of what it was all about; but it still casts a grave reflection on the government's failure to formulate specific war aims and its inadequate information policy.

Criticism of the latter is common everywhere. There is a universal feeling that our military bigwigs hold up unfavorable news much longer than the necessity of withholding information from the enemy requires. I heard widespread discussion, all of it adverse, when the story of Japanese losses in a naval battle in the South Pacific was released a day earlier than a report of our own losses. Another common complaint is that American casualty lists are not published from day to day or week to week. Many persons think that detailed reports of casualties would help to keep us on our toes.

By and large, the people approve of the job the President is doing, although not without qualifications. The percentage expressing approval dropped from about 80 to 70 per cent during the Congressional-election campaign, rose sharply after the North African invasion, and stood at 75 per cent once more early this year. A plurality of voters favors Roosevelt for President in 1944—but only if the war is still on.

Even the President's supporters express many criticisms of Washington policies. A remark I heard very frequently was that "bureaucracy is getting out of hand; the government has too many employees, and there is too much duplication of functions." The Administration is also accused of a vacillating policy on questions which affect the lives of almost everyone. Resentment is especially high because of the delay in settling such problems as the control of man-power, the size of the army, and the drafting of fathers. According to the Gallup poll, five-sixths of the people approve of the Selective Service system, a slight majority favor drafting man-power for our war industries where necessary, and three-fourths of all war workers and others are willing to work a minimum forty-eight-hour week.

Four-fifths of the people accept rationing as necessary, but they don't like some of the methods by which it has been placed in effect. Most people favor the surprise technique used in instituting shoe rationing. Announcements that coffee and canned goods were to be rationed seemed to most people a major blunder, since nothing was done to prevent hoarding. Meat shortages in the West and in boom towns elsewhere have focused much regional resentment upon the OPA's failure to take sufficiently into account such matters as freight rates and population changes. Minor nuisances such as the "tire inspection racket" and the ill-considered temporary ban on sliced bread are considered most irritating of all.

Political bickering in Washington comes in for a good share of homespun cussing. Many liberally inclined persons with whom I talked condemned Congressional sniping at the President; a few conservatives were outraged by Roosevelt's alleged ambitions for a fourth term. All factions joined in deploring the personal feuds among Washington executives. The slowness of Congress and the Administration in getting together on some form of pay-as-you-go tax legislation has been hard for most citizens to stomach. The Gallup poll showed that two-thirds of the people favored changing to a current basis as long ago as last November, and by March the proportion had risen to three-fourths of all employed taxpayers.

I found the majority of people critical of the Administration's labor policy, to which they attribute jurisdictional disputes and wildcat stoppages in war industry. A ban on strikes during war time is favored by 64 per cent both of the public and of war workers themselves, according to a Gallup poll taken in May.

Criticism of our State Department's policies in North Africa and Spain is usual in liberal circles. Although the general public seems little conscious of the issues, the well-informed minority feels intensely about them. In addition, on the West Coast the feeling prevails that our diplomats and military leaders are slighting the Chinese to send help to our European allies.

Mainly because of the belief that it will take longer to defeat Japan than Germany, most people think that the Japanese are the greater military threat to this country. Racial feeling is high against Japan. Almost half of us feel that not only the Japanese government but the Japanese nation is our major enemy, whereas in the case of Germany nearly three-fourths of us hold that the Nazi government rather than the German people is the real foe. Anti-Japanese feeling runs highest on the Pacific Coast, of course, but it is strong in every region. Evidence of this is the agitation against relocation of evacuated Japanese in Colorado, Wyoming, and Arkansas. In Jackson, Michigan, I found that the town had been almost torn asunder by a proposal of the Y. W. C. A. to allow a Nisei girl to attend Jackson Junior College. The local press fought the plan, and it was finally killed by the board of education.

This war differs from the last in one very important respect. This time our eyes are on the post-war world. We are determined to try to prevent future wars, even though we have little confidence that it will be possible to do so. And we are worried about the economic slump which may follow the war. At the turn of the year the Gallup poll asked this question: "Aside from winning the war, what do you think is the most important problem facing this country today?" Here are the main answers: the economic situation, the necessity to prevent inflation and another depression—16 per cent; the food shortage here and abroad and the need for more food production—12 per cent; to make a lasting peace, to end future wars—11 per cent; the farm-labor shortage, the man-power problem—10 per cent; post-war conditions, reconstruction of the world—8 per cent; a job for everyone after the war, prevent unemployment—7 per cent.

Gallup polls have found that nine-tenths of the people have definite ideas about what should be done after the war. Early this year 76 per cent thought that we should "take an active part in world affairs" rather than "stay out of world affairs as much as we can." This was a new high in internationalism. Those holding the minority (isolationist) view dropped from about 26 per cent of all persons questioned in October of last year to 14 per cent in January, 1943. Furthermore, 74 per cent of all persons questioned in April felt that "the countries fighting the Axis should set up an international police force after the war was over to try to preserve peace throughout the world." This strong majority sentiment for a measure which was approved by only 46 per cent in August, 1939, stands in glaring contrast to the refusal of the Senate to commit itself on the same issue when it was polled by the Associated Press in April.

The National Opinion Research Center similarly found in January that 74 per cent of us were favorable to the notion of the United States joining a "union of nations" after this war. In order to "try out a union of nations as a possible way of preventing wars," a clear majority of us are willing (1) "to stay on a rationing system in this country for about five years to help feed the starving people of other countries"; (2) "to pay more taxes for a few years while the new union is being organized, even if people in the other countries can't afford to pay as much"; and (3) "to allow part of the American army to remain overseas for several years after the war to help establish order."

The things a majority of us are not willing to do include (1) giving up our army, navy, and air force, even though all other nations should be willing to do so; (2) forgetting about reparations payments; (3) "allowing foreign goods to come into this country and compete with the things we grow or make here—even if the prices are lower." The inconsistencies of these views show the need for further education if popular enthusiasm for post-war planning is not to be sidetracked by misunderstanding of what is needed for a constructive peace.

The Ball-Burton-Hatch-Hill proposal for a United Nations government to police the world provoked widespread discussion. This was the first definite plan for the post-war world offered in high official circles, and the way the people grasped at it was an indication of their psychological need for more positive war aims. "It's about time they did something to see that there won't be another world war about the time my grandchildren are grown up," an elderly Indiana woman told me. On the steps of a Kentucky hotel I heard an Administration Democrat deliver a diatribe against Roosevelt for not giving his full support to the Ball resolution. "He ought to hang his head in shame," he said. "Here he's been advocating collective security and quarantining the aggressors all these years, and when some Republican Senators offer him their support, what does he do? Plays party politics, instead of accepting it like a gift from heaven."

A small opinion poll in Valparaiso, Indiana, using return postcards, obtained replies 83 per cent in the affirmative to the question, "Should the government take steps now, during the war, with our allies to set up a world organization to preserve the peace?" But the important thing was the high degree of interest shown: 27 per cent of the people polled—a new high record—took the trouble to mail back their ballots, as compared with less than 10 per cent on questions concerning voting age and other domestic issues.

There is less active interest in domestic than in international post-war problems, owing partly to our incurable American optimism, always strong in good times. Gallup found in April that four-fifths of those now employed believed their jobs would continue after the war. Of those who did not think so, only one in twenty anticipated much difficulty in finding a new job. Fortune found that young people were least optimistic; 38 per cent believed that "young men after this war are going to have a better chance to get ahead than young men had before this war," while 37 per cent thought the opposite.

Since neither the press nor the Administration did justice to the report of the National Resources Planning Board on post-war social security, in April only a third of the people had heard of the board's plan for the post-war period. (If Gallup had asked whether they had heard of "the Administration's 'cradle-to-the-grave' security plan," the results might have been very different.) Of those who had heard of the plan, 70 per cent favored it; only 18 per cent opposed it.

There are weak spots in our domestic armor, to be sure. There is the racial question in the South, which is being exploited by self-seeking politicians under the old slogan of "white supremacy." The Administration's fence-straddling has served only to antagonize Southern whites, Northern Negroes, and liberals alike. There is low morale in some of our war industries, such as ship-building and aircraft. This results from the prevalent beliefs that the government is keeping wages down but failing to control prices accordingly; that the industrialists are waxing fat on war profits; and that labor and materials are being wasted through poor planning and supervision. Fortune found late last year that 48 per cent of all factory workers believed that "war production can be made to go faster." More than a third of them said specifically that "more efficient operation of plants, better scheduling and flow of materials, elimination of waste," and similar improvements were necessary. And there is political agitation, particularly on the fourth-term issue, by Republicans and Southern Democrats who seem more intent on beating Roosevelt than on defeating the Axis.

But in spite of these danger signals, which are in some degree inevitable in a democracy, America as a nation is waging the shooting war with a determination we have never before exhibited. This is in a very real sense a people's war, and our citizens are resolved that it shall be a people's peace as well.

Goose-Step in Tishomingo

BY CLEMENT GREENBERG

TISHOMINGO, Alfalfa Bill Murray's home town, in south central and darkest Oklahoma, was chosen with good reason as the location of a prison camp. God help the fugitive who tries to hide himself in the unsubstantial foliage of its gullies or to slip past the squinting eyes of the Bible-pounding natives. If they don't catch him, the Indians certainly will, or he will perish of bored inanition on Tishomingo's broad main street. The camp itself is a little under two miles to the south, on Route 99, close by the banks of the erratic Washita. It was finished over a month ago. Except for a tall double fence of wire, with a tower at each corner, inclosing one of the two clusters of green-roofed barracks, it looks like any ordinary small military camp. When I first visited it, the guards, a Military Police unit of 150 men, were already there, complaining of the isolation. They knew that the prisoners they were to guard would be prisoners of war, and had heard that they might be Germans but were not sure. Anyhow, whoever they turned out to be they would be put to work cutting down the nearby woods, for the land surrounding the camp will be flooded when the Denison Dam is completed. After the woods are cut, the camp will be torn down and the prisoners sent elsewhere.

Eighteen days later, on April 22, I saw a file of open trucks debouch into the main street of Tishomingo. Every other one was filled with helmeted soldiers armed with tommy-guns and shotguns. Sandwiched between were trucks packed with standing men in blue uniforms something like our old fatigue denims, with the fronts of the trousers red and the letters PW painted on the backs of the jackets. Some of the men in blue returned our gaze with smiles; others were grim or had the perturbed and doubtful expression of persons looking for the first time at a place to which they have been brought against their will and in which they expect to remain too long. Most of them were boys or hardly more than that, and a good half were blonds. They were Germans all right, for I heard them talking.

The following Sunday I walked over to the camp again. Sunday is the only day on which outsiders are allowed in the immediate area. The camp is at a point where the rolling country descends and smooths itself out into a flat valley. Little fat pigs were wallowing in the deep ditch where the road to the camp forked from the main road. Farther on a soldier in green fatigues was playing with a blacksnake four and a half feet long, holding it up by its tail. It kept raising its small sharp head to get at his hand but could not get enough leverage to reach all the way back.

Men were running and bounding about behind the barbed live wires of the high fence. I was allowed to come no closer than twenty-five yards to it, and the prisoners were held off another ten yards on the other side by a chalked line. If they crossed it they would be fired at after three commands to halt. The first prisoners I saw distinctly were a group of about twelve sitting on the new spring grass and playing cards. This time their clothes puzzled me, for many of them wore well-fitting blue breeches that looked not at all like fatigue dress. The guards told me that they were dyed World War I uniforms which had been issued by the German army as fatigues, and of which every prisoner had three sets.

One pink-skinned young blond wearing nothing but shorts was running around inside the chalk line with nice form except that he bent too far forward—probably because he had been trained to run with a pack on his back. Two or three others almost equally naked were doing cartwheels and somersaults in best German gymnastic style. Some were sun-bathing. Everybody's skin was surprisingly white but almost everybody looked well set-up and athletic. One, as he walked and talked with a companion, every now and then kicked up his legs in a smart-looking goose step—whether it was done absent-mindedly, out of physical exuberance, or to keep in practice, I could not tell, but it seemed to annoy the guards. "Look at the son of a bitch!" they would say every time the German began to swing his legs. A stout sergeant said that the lot of them should never have been taken prisoners in the first place but shot on the spot. (I can understand why it is the army's practice to change the guards at prison camps every two months or so; they may either become too attached to the prisoners or else get so irritated with them that they will shoot at them on the slightest provocation. Neither the guards nor anyone else is allowed to talk to the prisoners.)

It was from the guards that I got most of my information. There were 310 prisoners in all, part of an original group of 1,000 brought from Africa, all whom had been placed in camps in Oklahoma. Some of them had been through twelve days of continuous action before being captured; some had seen service before on the Russian front. I was told that one of the prisoners was only fourteen years old. Two I saw could not have been more than fifteen. They were walking back and forth and talking to each other with the gravity and the economy of movement and gesture of much older persons. Several others showed by twisted arms or scarred necks and faces that they had been wounded. The quiet, relaxed self-confidence with which the prisoners handled themselves surprised me; it was in such contrast to the dejection or resignation or maybe shamefaced relief one would expect of prisoners. But, then, they had told the interpreter stationed here that the guards would soon be handing their guns over to them. One of them, while being brought through New York, had expressed surprise at seeing the skyscrapers still standing. He had been told that New York had been bombed. When they had been asked why they got themselves out of their barracks at 4:30 in the morning to exercise when their reveille came only at 6, they had answered that they wanted to keep themselves fit for the day when the Führer would arrive in America. A week after my visit, on May 1, they celebrated the holiday the Nazis have substituted for Pfingsten by bringing a tree back to camp, setting it up in the compound, decorating it with garlands of flowers and birds cut out of cardboard, and then strutting around making speeches and heiling—although, according to the guards, it is against prison regulations to salute in Nazi fashion or shout "Heil Hitler."

As it happened, May 1 came on a Saturday, and the prisoners did not have to work. On their arrival each of them had been given the choice of signing up for work or doing nothing; but once having signed up, a man has to work every day except Saturday and Sunday, whether he wants to or not. Working hours are from around 7 to around 2:30 in the afternoon. The pay is 70 cents a day, of which 40 cents is placed to the prisoner's credit at the post exchange and the remainder withheld until eventual repatriation. They are issued the same food as their guards, and it is prepared in German style by their own cooks. The guards told me that at mess they never leave a scrap of food on their plates, so used are they to scarcity. But I, with my melodramatic imagination, wondered whether they might not be storing it for a break. One prisoner has lately got on the nerves of the guards by standing for hours on the chalk line, examining the fence and the tower installations with purposeful eyes. I myself noticed how intently the prisoners watched when the guards were being changed and were marching along the fence. But it may have been only a professional interest in things military, which the prisoners certainly have. They are intrigued by every military formality or piece of equipment they see.

The prisoners maintain their own army discipline under two top sergeants, who seem to be the only men among them close to forty. They rate salutes, unlike the non-commissioned officers in our army—whom the prisoners nevertheless insist on saluting as they do their own. In the German army the most common punishment for mild offenses is to deprive the culprit of a meal or two. The next degree of punishment is, rather abruptly, corporeal. One of the top sergeants asked the M. P. mess sergeant to withhold food from a disobedient prisoner—I believe it was a case in which the prisoner had chosen to obey an order from the lieutenant of the guards which conflicted with the top sergeant's orders. Anyhow, the mess sergeant refused the request and fed the man. The top sergeant immediately came into the mess hall where his man was eating, pulled him outside by the collar, and gave him a beating. I was told the man did not lift a hand in self-defense.

The guards admit that the Germans are willing and capable workers, eager to be helpful and lending a hand with any work they see being done around them even when they are not ordered to do so. They are also given credit for their stoic qualities. One of them who had gashed his foot with an ax and was brought to the medical officer attached to our Air Force unit sat in the dispensary and stolidly watched the wound being sewn together without making a sound.

To remark these qualities in the prisoners is not encouraging. Unquestionably, Hitler has had good human material, from a military point of view, to work with. However, their age and their physical condition and the fact that the majority of them are parachutists or Panzer personnel indicate that most of these prisoners are picked troops, not altogether typical of the average German soldier. That they make such a show of Nazi ardor is more disquieting. It is possible to explain this—but not very convincingly, I feel—by the fact that they are more or less at the mercy of their non-commissioned officers, who could make life miserable for any prisoner not quite 100 per cent a Nazi.

Advertise for Victory

BY CHARLES NEIDER

THE advertising industry has undergone extensive changes since Pearl Harbor. Volume held up remarkably well during the first year of our participation in the war, considering that advertising in general has been falling steadily since the halcyon days of 1929, and its resiliency last year was something of a surprise even to the trade. As a whole it dropped about 5.5 per cent as compared with 1941, the expected decrease in automobile and other consumer-goods advertising being substantially offset by the increase in institutional ads and in advance bids for post-war business. In a study of newspaper linage in ninety-eight cities Printer's Ink found that industrial ads gained in all cities and accounted for 6 per cent of general advertising, whereas they accounted for only 2 per cent in 1941. Curiously enough, although the nation is smoking more cigarettes than ever before, tobacco linage dropped in all cities but one. The shift from consumer goods to industrial and institutional ads was indicated in a Lord and Thomas survey which reported that during the first seven months of the war competitive product ads dropped from 68 per cent to 38 per cent of all magazine copy analyzed.

Advertising depends on and inspires competition. In a nation doing most of its heavy business with the government, competition is minimized. This situation has its obvious advantages for business; on the other hand, business is desirous of keeping the public's good-will, protecting the popularity of its trade names, continuing its contacts with its dealers, and preparing for the post-war period, when cutthroat competition promises to flourish in all fields. And so business advertises heavily, even when it has nothing to sell to the public.

The New Deal, which has occasionally frightened advertising executives by implying that advertising is social waste, is in high favor among them now. It maintains, through the Treasury Department, what has been characterized by executives as a "benevolently indefinite" rule against allowing excessive advertising expenses as tax deductions—which means that anything goes short of murder. The Treasury Department's interpretation of what is excessive has at times irked advertising men, but they have found an invaluable ally in the Department of Commerce, which has consistently encouraged the use of widespread tax-free advertising. And this, too, is a factor in maintaining the high volume of war-time advertising.

With various types of war-time taxes adding up to about 90 per cent of income, large companies can buy up advertising space at something like ten cents on the dollar. Their liberality is readily understood, but what they do with that space has a national interest that transcends the soundness of their investment.

The picture is far from being all black. Many organizations soberly advertise the work they are doing for the government and remind the public that after the war they will be ready to serve the consumer efficiently and enthusiastically. Some attempt honestly to lift the general morale by telling of army and navy exploits and by displaying their army-navy "E's" with thanks to their employees. Others urge the public to buy war bonds, to conserve gas, and to reduce the number of long-distance telephone calls. The United States Rubber Company has been informing the public on the proper care of tires, and the Home Insurance Company of New York has been running an excellent series of fire-prevention ads.

Other concerns, however, have discovered the value of advertising as a medium for propaganda serving some special interest or private purpose. If you can urge the public to buy war bonds and to accept rationing intelligently, why not urge it to support imperialism, isolationism, the status quo, or "normalcy"? Why not do yourself a little good while keeping your name before the public at ten cents on the dollar?

A. N. Kemp, president of American Airlines, who seems to take delight in signing all his company's ads personally, has gone in extensively for advertising of this sort. As a Christmas present to readers of the New York Times, Mr. Kemp bought a full page in the issue of December 25. Centered against a background occupying fully a third of the page hung a small star, beneath which, in large type, were the words "Global Peace." Mr. Kemp's special message of cheer to the American public was: "We look to the sky for the symbol of peace on earth, the Star of Bethlehem! Also, we look to the sky for victory in this global war. America must be dominant in the post-war global air so that we shall have Freedom and Peace on earth."

This note of air domination is echoed by others in the industry. In a recent ad in Skyways, the Century Aircraft Company of California used a full page to present the slogan: "Control of the Sky—an umbrella of safety under which wars can be won and a continuous peace assured." The increasing weight attached by the aircraft industry to the power of advertising was reduced to eloquent statistics in a survey of magazine, radio, and farm-paper advertising contained in Printer's Ink for February 5. Vultee Aircraft, according to the survey, spent nothing on advertising in 1939, only $4,200 in 1940, and $126,560 in 1942. Pan-American spent $276,384 in 1942 as against $3,086 in 1939. Cessna Aircraft, which spent not a cent as recently as 1940, spent $187,575 last year. Lockheed spent $68,300 in 1939, $87,625 in 1940, $226,565 in 1941, and $443,557 in our first year of the war. Bendix, which in 1940 spent $18,875, last year spent $384,720. Only two companies—American Airlines and United Air Lines—were fairly stable in their advertising expenditures. Both companies were paying out more than $100,000 for the purpose in 1939, when their competitors were spending comparatively insignificant sums. Their expenditures increased in 1940 and 1941 and dropped to their 1939 levels in 1942.

Among the corporations that have made persistent use of advertising to argue the case for pre-war laissez faire, the most blatant is the Nash-Kelvinator Corporation. In a series of ads captioned "Not Alone . . ." "When the Last Bomb Goes Home . . .," and "When You Come Back to Me . . ." Nash-Kelvinator has gone far to carry out the idea expressed by Homer McKee, vice-president of the advertising firm of Roche, Williams, and Cunyngnam. "The people must be told," said Mr. McKee in a speech cited in Advertising Age, "that if they hurt free enterprise they hurt the girl who works in the laundry, the cab driver, the white-collared clerk, the widow who, with trembling hands, clips the coupon that holds body and soul together."

But Nash-Kelvinator is far from alone in its service to the cause of the status quo. The McGraw-Hill Publishing Company, which puts out Business Week and Aviation, pleaded in six columns of the New York Times (January 3) for "seed money" for the aviation industry—and incidentally attacked our whole war-time tax structure. "In our proper anxiety to prevent inflation and control war profits," warned McGraw-Hill, "we have passed tax laws that are taking away most of the 'seed money' that aviation companies will need when the time comes to go it on their own in the post-war world. . . . The tax law, and government contracts, should allow American industry to accumulate funds for the numerous tasks of post-war development." In the April 6 issue of the Times the plea was broadened in behalf of American industry in general, and the attack on war taxes was more boldly articulated as an attack on the excess-profits law. The ad closed by asking readers to write to their Congressmen in objection to the law. The Beechnut Packing Company asks us not to "forget the spirit that built America—the spirit of free enterprise." Reader's Digest on February 18 paid for a full page of the Times to reprint an article by the president of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States entitled "Your Stake in Capitalism." And the Chicago and Southern Air Lines Company advertises that it believes "in the American dream, in the resourcefulness of private enterprise and personal initiative, in the power of free men to serve a high statesmanship as well as the profit motive."

Inevitably the war has brought to advertising a higher concentration of vulgarity. American advertising has always been on the adolescent side, making its appeal to the lowest possible denominator of the reading public. Now, under the stress of a national crisis, patriotism is often used as a screen behind which to sell merchandise—a device which depends on emotional transference from a worthy to a more or less unworthy object, from desire for freedom to desire for candy or fur coats.

On the first day of the second war-bond drive, numerous clothing stores signed their names to ads in the Times calling for the purchase of bonds. To some people these ads seem offensive because of the obvious disparity between the necessities of total war and the luxuries the stores normally feature. They do not have the same objection when the ads are signed by companies engaged in war work. These people would rather see the government advertising war bonds than have such names as The Tailored Woman, Henri Bendel, Jane Engel, Peck and Peck, or Abercrombie and Fitch beneath the slogan "They Give Their Lives . . . You Lend Your Money"—particularly since advertisements aiding the war-bond drive are tax-exempt. A more dignified expression of patriotism perhaps would be for these stores to donate space to the government. As some measure of compensation they might then make semi-annual reports, through advertisements, of amounts so donated.

Examples of merchandise sold under cover of the flag are countless. "Keep in Trim . . . Sleep soundly in 'Fighting Trims,'" reads one; "For every fighting niece of Uncle Sam, Munsingwear has designed 'Fighting Trims.'" "Good news anywhere!" runs another; "It's a boy—and he's thriving on Carnation!" Beneath this breath-taking caption is a photograph of a soldier holding a letter. "Many a nervous buck private flops down on his cot—trying to take in such heart-jerking news!" cries the copy writer. The reader flops down on his cot trying to take in such heart-jerking copy.

"Loose Talk Can Cost Lives!" says a Stetson ad, and under a photograph of a supposedly sinister man at a telephone are the vicious words: ". . . sails tonight, world's biggest, packed with troops . . . Berlin waiting." And then the punch line: "Keep It Under Your Stetson."

"Establish your home front at the Beverly!"; "Hearts High! Until V-Day be beautiful and dutiful . . . with 'Bond Street' Beauty Preparations (for you, by Yardley!);"; "Introducing Volunteer . . . La Cross' new nail-polish shade for fingertips off and on duty . . . It's a deep red, stirring as the times, bright as courage!"; "Doing Man's Work . . . Retaining Woman's Loveliness . . . a wartime secret shared by thousands." The secret? Wear Formfit. "Do Dermatologists Fight? Yes, indeed." And what is the choice of dermatologists? Mennen, obviously. Try "Courage—a fragrance attuned to the times . . . stirring as martial music . . . reflecting the gallant spirit of today."

And remember this: "Men who plan beyond tomorrow prefer the world's lightest highball!" Seagram's V. O. Canadian, in case you aren't a man who plans beyond tomorrow. "Imagine a Commando afraid of me," says a puzzled little thing with body odor, the only cure for which is Cashmere Bouquet soap. "You know we're building the biggest army in our history. You know that candy is a fine food for soldiers"—especially Baby Ruth or Butter-finger. "Freedom Red Lipstick . . . fighting-mad red for gallant lips . . . Lucien Lelong's Freedom Red!"

The cigarette companies are among the most persistent users of the war theme, with Camels probably the most blatant and Chesterfields a close second. Camels have been featuring men and women in uniform, explaining that "In the navy they say 'belay' for stop, 'chop-chop' for hurry up, 'stew' for commissary officer, and 'Camel' for the navy man's favorite cigarette." "Co-ed leaves Campus to fill a man's job," says another Camel ad. "She's 'in the service'—even to her choice of cigarettes . . . Camels, of course!" Chesterfield is more liberal in its interpretation of what constitutes the war effort, but it exults in uniforms, guns, and flashing teeth. Typical was the ad featuring two Marine Raiders holding shiny sub-machine-guns at rakish angles and dangling Chesterfields from their lips.

Occasionally one runs into a refreshingly sensible ad. Germaine Monteil ran one in the New Yorker of February 27. "We wish it were otherwise," the ad read, "but, frankly, we don't think that Germaine Monteil's Face Powder and Beauty Balm will build morale or help preserve our way of life. Their job is to make you look prettier, which they perform brilliantly," etc. "A Civilian's Prayer" sponsored by the Northwestern National Life Insurance Company of Minneapolis ran: "Help me, Almighty God, to be the only hero I can ever be. Help me see how important it is that I go gladly and energetically about the humdrum business of saving my tires and fuel, of spending less and saving more, of eating less and working harder, of asking less and giving more. . . . Help me to realize that Americans are fighting today, not to create freedom and opportunity for the ruthless and greedy, but to make it possible for kind men, men of integrity, responsible men, to work in peace, and to work for the common good."

CONCESSIONS to Hitlerite Germany will fortify Hitler's position by enabling him to boast that he has obtained what was refused to Brüning, Stresemann, and German governments of the left. They will be a triumph and a justification of methods of violence, but they will fail in their object, for the more Hitler gets, the more he will want.—ROBERT DELL, May 3, 1933.

OVER THE COUNTRY resentment is rising like steam from thawing fields. . . . I think of men and women, educated, sensitive, strong, who calmly admit that . . . they are now willing to kill, and if need be, to be killed, for the sake of the freedom of their country. I think of one girl, cultured, privileged, beautiful. "I would willingly carry the bomb myself which would put an end to Machado, and if need be, to me also." She is not exceptional.—HUBERT HERRING, May 3, 1933.

If you can say, "Tovarish, pozhalista" ("Comrade, please") and wave a piece of paper with an address on it under any good comrade's nose, he will put you on street cars, take you off, walk up to the door with you, ring the bell, wait until your friend appears, and very likely come in and eat with you.—AMY S. JENNINGS, May 10, 1933.

I DISCERN three major social-economic trends in the United States: (1) our working class is developing into a proletariat, that is, workmen who are not at the same time capitalists; (2) our farmers are becoming peasants, that is, soil tillers who own little if any property; (3) our government is acquiring bigger and bigger stakes in private industry, that is, state capitalism.—LOUIS FISCHER, May 31, 1933.

Bombing Won't Win

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

THE heavy and long-continued bombing raids on important objectives in Hitler's Europe are beginning to tell on the German war effort. Like a boxer who has absorbed too many body punches, Germany is slowing down to a point where a knockout blow may be possible. We are probably not yet ready to deliver it on land. It is very doubtful whether available troops and shipping will be sufficient to support a campaign capable of diverting as many as a third of the 218 German divisions which Churchill reports on the Russian front. Whether Germany can be defeated from the air will be put to the fullest test in the months just ahead.

Our position in the air today is far different from what it was four or two years or even one year ago. The overwhelming power of the Luftwaffe is now little more than a legend. The superiority in air-power reserves which the Germans enjoyed early in the war has been taken from them by heavy bombing of their industrial cities, mounting Allied production, and an unfavorable ratio of losses. Germany is credited today with an output not in excess of 2,000 to 2,400 planes a month. Japanese production, important for its diversionsary effect on the United States, has been variously estimated at between 600 and 1,500 planes a month, and the output of the few and thoroughly bombed Italian factories—in any case unimportant—can hardly exceed 500. Our enemies, then, are not building more than 4,000 planes a month, and possibly are finishing far less.

In comparison, production in the United States makes an impressive showing. In April, the last month for which figures have been released, just under 7,000 planes were turned out, a large proportion of them heavy bombers. If the earlier rate of gain has been maintained since then, we are now building at least 8,000 a month. The President's recent statement that we were completing more planes than all the rest of the world confirms this.

No complete figures on British and Soviet plane production have been released recently. High military men in this country say that the British output is now greater than Germany's and that the Soviet Union is not far behind. An estimate of 4,000 planes a month for our principal allies is probably not excessive. Our own production figures, unfortunately, are for assembly-line rather than battlefield deliveries, and hence subtraction must be made for the shiploads of the products of Lockheed, Curtis, Vultee, and other firms which have gone to the bottom of the Atlantic. No one in authority has cared to reveal the actual number to be subtracted, but there can be no doubt that it is large. Even with such losses, however, we enjoy a huge advantage in plane output—certainly about three to one.

These figures do much to explain recent campaigns. Germany is not saving up air power for some unexpected blow in a new quarter. Its poor showing in the air over Western Europe, Russia, and North Africa has been due simply to lack of planes.

Quantity is, of course, only an approximate rule with which to measure air power. The quality of men and planes is far more important. And here we enjoy an even more striking advantage, for the early great numerical strength of the Luftwaffe was purchased at the cost of a sacrifice of quality. This slight inferiority in performance has been reflected in much longer casualty lists, and most of the German "first team" has disappeared at a time when the United States is able to throw into the fray a large number of picked men. The three-to-one ratio of losses during the last six months in Africa indicates clearly enough the deteriorating quality of German pilots and planes.

Winning the battle of the assembly lines, however, is not knocking out Germany. For well over a year we have been dealing constantly heavier blows in an effort to achieve as many as possible of the following objectives: (1) the softening up of Germany's defenses as a prelude to invasion, (2) the wrecking of its war industry, with a resultant lowered output, (3) the serious disruption of its system of communications, (4) a heavy reduction in the building and operation of U-boats, (5) injury to the physical and mental health of the German people, in short, destruction of morale. How far have these purposes been achieved? We have, of course, no sure way of knowing. Indirect evidence, German admissions, reports from neutral sources, and the testimony of our own aviators, when taken together, do afford some interesting information.

Perhaps the least success has been achieved in wrecking German morale. While Swiss sources and the observations of our own airmen indicate dismay, confusion, and little attempt at even self-defense on the part of the Italians, German prisoners and letters from home found on German dead report great physical destruction and terrible suffering but no loss of fighting spirit. To all appearances, the Germans, like the Spanish, Chinese, and British, can "take it."

Nor has heavy bombing been especially effective against U-boats, which, in their main bases, have for months been assembled and repaired in bomb-proof garages. Where they have not had such protection, as at Vegesack, a few U-boats have been destroyed outright, but these cases have been rare. The destruction accomplished at such ports as Brest and St. Nazaire should decrease workers' efficiency and hinder the submarine campaign, but unfortunately, the best possible evidence that these attacks have been inconclusive is being furnished in the Atlantic at the present time. A recent Admiralty report described a convoy battle in which a "wolf pack" of no fewer than twenty-five U-boats participated—a greater number in one spot than the Germans had in actual operation in the whole Atlantic during most of World War I.

It is in attacks upon transportation lines and arms industries that our bombing has been paying the greatest dividends. Hundreds of locomotives have been wrecked, river and coastal transport has been interrupted, and manufacturing plants have had to be diverted from providing munitions to the construction of rolling stock. In summarizing the February work of the R. A. F. Air Minister Sinclair mentioned more than a million persons rendered homeless, a cut in steel production of a million and a quarter tons, and more than 1,700 acres in seven cities totally devastated, in addition to damage in Berlin and Essen which had not been accurately determined. Three months later, after several raids which have broken all previous records, this damage has undoubtedly been multiplied.

Nevertheless, bombing will have to be extended over a much larger area if Germany is to be defeated from the air, for as much of its industry as possible has been moved eastward. As raids become longer, however, casualties mount, and the bomb load which can be carried goes down. Vienna, Prague, Pilsen, and Berlin, for example, are targets whose bombing lies on the marginal line between profit and loss. Other cities in eastern Germany, while well within theoretical bomber range and important industrially, have not been attacked at all. Similarly, transportation lines in northern France, the Low Countries, and northwestern Germany have been well peppered, but targets farther east have been largely left alone.

The evidence, then, does not suggest any likelihood of bringing about "unconditional surrender" from the air. Germany has been greatly hurt but is still immensely strong, especially on land. Between the 20 per cent reduction in industrial output which the most optimistic judges believe Anglo-American bombing has caused in Germany—others put it at 10 to 15 per cent—and the approach to absolute stoppage which might cause the Nazis to give up, there is a wide margin. In the months ahead we shall doubtless reduce this margin and bring closer the day of victory. But we should not count on air power alone to win.

Inspiration Wanted

BY LOUIS FISCHER

NO OTHER war was like this one: no war ever aroused so much discussion of the peace. The desire to see the contours of the future is not idle curiosity or cheap crystal gazing. The shape of the peace to come interests many millions of Americans deeply and passionately. I think the reason is that the usual motives for fighting a war are absent.

As a nation we are not imperialistic; we do not want more territory. We do not hate our enemies very violently, nor do we love our allies sufficiently to endure the sacrifices that this conflict entails. Because these ordinary war-time stimuli are not present to sustain morale, the country, with healthy instinct, is searching for an extraordinary inspiration to fight. Such inspiration could be found in a conviction that victory will make life better and the world safer.

The average American's approach to the problems of the future peace is simple and personal. He says: "Two major wars in twenty-four years. That's bad. Something's wrong. I hope little Johnny, now five years old, won't have to fight in the third world war."

During five recent months of travel from Maine to Alabama to California I found widespread concern lest deeply rooted circumstances and the pettiness of politicians here and abroad ruin the peace settlement. The old isolationist chestnut that "wars never change anything" is far from dead. People are worried and confused. They are critical of everybody in government office. Some remain silent out of loyalty to country.

Youth especially is cynical about politicians and about the possibility of effective public pressure on politicians. Cynicism and doubts do not help men and women to face arduous tasks and bear the loss of life, eyes, limbs, and wealth in war. I lectured in a score of universities and schools. Optimism about the post-war era is suspect, and a speaker is closely examined for rose-colored glasses. I was frequently asked whether Winston Churchill and Joseph Stalin favored the new internationalism that is the only safeguard against another war. I was asked why Roosevelt didn't make speeches like Wallace's. Justly or unjustly, the State Department is regarded more critically than any other branch of the federal government. This tends to undermine confidence in our ability to forge a solid peace.

It is not that Americans wish to abstain from the peace. The contrary is true. I lectured in churches, colleges, executives' clubs, women's clubs, and in community forums where the garb of the audience ran the gamut from mink coat to overalls. I listened in trains and buses. I was interviewed by journalists and editors and then interviewed them. I rediscovered old friends and acquaintances. I read newspapers in large towns and small. I am completely convinced that the country is ready to participate in the coming peace arrangement. No one disputes the proposition that if America remains aloof from the peace there will be no peace; that there will be, instead, another war, and we shall be in it. That is one thing America seems to have learned. But skepticism on the possibility of making a good peace may ultimately kill the wish to participate in the peace.

America is engaged in a quest for faith. At present America's will to wage war stems from one source—patriotic duty. The United States is at war; every citizen has a duty, some in the front line, some behind the lines. Not a few Americans still think that we should not have become involved in this war. But whatever they thought before Pearl Harbor—and many hate to be reminded of it—Americans are unanimously loyal, and they answer "Here" when Uncle Sam calls. There is a job to be done, a big job.

This unquestioning devotion is the pillar of our national morale, the only real pillar. All the talk about the shape of the peace to come is a search for a twin pillar. Americans want to get excited about the war. They want it to be more than a job. They are groping for a vision of a brighter future which will enable them to believe in a better world born of this bloody war.

Even the hard-boiled American is part idealist. Today the ubiquitous memory of the First World War, which was won, and then lost in an inadequate peace, dampens the ardor of a country that functions best when it thrills to a higher cause. America wants to believe. But it is afraid to pin its hopes to a star. It dissects every slogan and shibboleth. It is not atrocity-conscious. Its emotions are under rigid control. It is extremely wary of anything that suggests propaganda. It demands concreteness. Promises of a better world will not do. Promises are quoted far below par. Promises must be accompanied by the beginning of fulfillment.

The interest in world affairs has risen perceptibly. I talked with the managers of at least fifty bookstores in various cities. Every one of them said that they were selling more political books than ever before. More newspapers are being read.

In April I addressed the Fort Worth Lecture Foundation. When the meeting opened, the chairman asked for an expression of views to guide the program committee in arranging next season's programs. "How many want the emphasis placed on entertainment?" Three or four hands went up. "How many are especially interested in literature and the arts?" About ten hands were raised. "How many would like to have more lectures on the war and the peace?" Some three hundred hands were raised. This is typical. But with the mounting interest and understanding goes a realization of the difficulties that will beset the peacemakers.

The public is looking for expert leadership. It is grateful for enlightenment. Enough appears to be wrong in the administration of American affairs to make the people receptive to criticism provided it is constructive and not carping. Standpattism and excuses for blunders and mistakes are rarely welcomed. The Administration would be more popular if it frankly admitted its errors.

Wendell Willkie, I think, is talking to the heart of the country more than any other man because he is critical, yet pro-war. His "One World" is the best picture of a planet at war available to the general reading public. He has not convinced everybody that he is sincere, and some wonder why he has not spoken out as frankly on domestic issues as on imperialism and the peace. On the other hand, I was asked many times whether Willkie might not have the makings of a leader of American liberals.

In numerous places I came across groups of liberals who worry themselves sleepless over the Darlan-Peyrouton affair, the neglect of China, the mishandling of India, the survival of isolationism, and the triumph here and there of reactionaries in this country. These liberals would be glad to work for political change; they lack organization and leadership—and a program. So they feel helpless. This helplessness makes them more pessimistic than do the situations they would like to correct.

The amount of anti-union sentiment is frightening to one who knows from European experience that anti-labor agitation is the beginning of fascism. I have no idea what the trade unions are doing about it; their public-relations departments seem to be off fishing. The labor movement of America is heading for disaster, and may bring us all to disaster unless it unites on a strategy of war-time action, adheres to that strategy, and then explains it intelligibly to its own members and to the larger public. The general citizenry is anti-labor, and so are many working men and women.

The reactionaries are extremely busy fighting their war for the preservation of the past. The enemies of reaction are split and have no sense of direction. Their task, of course, is harder. It is easier to move backward to what was; you know how it looks. It is not so easy to move forward to a place you have never seen and cannot describe in definite terms. But we do know that the past includes two wars in one generation and much trouble in between. Certainly Europe and Asia know that their past has been ugly and bloody, and if we, advancing in this war, threaten to bring them a future which is like their past, they will not applaud.

In a practical sense, therefore, the battle for political supremacy in the United States will shape the peace, for if the past-lovers win the battle here they will fight for the past in the peace. The ideal peace, in their eyes, will be a return to the past. That past, however, was the mother of this war and the mother of the First World War, and it can still bear children.

The peace will be no better than the men who make it. And the men who make it will be those who rise to power and office during this war. The peace, in other words, is already being made. It is being made in the struggle that is now going on behind all the home fronts, particularly behind the front in America. There is no certainty that the reactionaries, status-quoers, and backward-lookers of all countries will not win this struggle. They will win it unless they meet stronger opposition. If they win it, the war may be lost in the peace.

This country has never doubted victory on the battlefield. But many Americans doubt whether we can win the peace against the powerful world forces already arrayed to block a settlement that departs from narrow nationalism, power politics, political and economic imperialism, and assumptions of white supremacy.

Joy over the victories of our young fighting men in battle is mingled with fear of old men in office.

Italian Rumoresque

BY GAETANO SALVEMINI

THERE must be a great many desertions from Fascism in Italy today. Mussolini and those among his henchmen who cannot turn their coats—and who are therefore in danger of losing their skins—doubtless feel that the very foundations of the Fascist dictatorship are disintegrating. This explains the recent shake-up in the Fascist Party. Mussolini has had to "mobilize" the most criminal elements among his followers. The new national secretary of the party, Scorza, is a typical representative of that criminal fringe. In 1925 he led the treacherous attack upon Amendola* which resulted in Amendola's death some months later. In 1928 he published an article in which he likened the Fascist Party to the Catholic church, explaining that he did not mean the Catholic church of weaklings like St. Francis of Assisi but the Catholic church of heroic popes, like Alexander Borgia, who were prepared even to poison their foes. Signor Scorza has done what all his kind have done—utilized political power for personal gain. He and Mussolini will stick together until every spark of hope vanishes, and then, if they are not killed, they will try to escape to Spain.

* Amendola was a noted liberal and leader of the opposition in the Italian Parliament after the March on Rome.

That much one can say without possessing any inside information. But our newspapermen and radio commentators seem to know much more. When Grandi left the Ministry of Justice on February 5, some of our most solemn papers gave out the good tidings that he had been dismissed from his post because he had become disloyal to Mussolini and had tried to set up an anti-Fascist nucleus within the Italian police. The story was probably concocted in Washington by someone who thought that in Italy, as in the United States, the federal police is responsible to the Department of Justice. Had he been better informed about Italian institutions he would have known that in Italy the police is under the Department of the Interior, which has always been run by Mussolini. A Minister of Justice in Italy could not hatch any conspiracy within the Italian police system. Grandi, despite his alleged attempts at treachery, remained chairman of the Fascist Lower House. In addition, a few days after the rumors were published, Grandi received the Knighthood of the Annunziata, the highest decoration in Italy. The King could not have bestowed that honor upon him without Mussolini's consent.

Another "good story" released some time ago by a radio commentator was to the effect that Mussolini is no longer on speaking terms with his son-in-law, Count Ciano, ambassador to the Vatican. What television apparatus permitted this commentator to reveal that when Mussolini and his son-in-law meet, one gazes at the ceiling while the other blows his nose and looks at the floor? The fact is that Ciano left the Foreign Office last February to become ambassador to the Holy See just on the eve of Archbishop Spellman's mission to Rome. At that time Mussolini needed a man at the Vatican who, no less than himself, was interested in saving his own skin, and who would never betray him, as might a professional diplomat, when the breakdown of the Fascist regime occurred. Ciano was the man. Ciano is there to look out as best he can for the interests of the Mussolini-Ciano combine in negotiating a way out of the present impasse.

However, the stories which are being circulated should not be ignored. If they do not tell us what is really happening in Italy, they tell us what those who concoct them in America and who circulate them through newspapermen and radio commentators want us to believe.

The British Foreign Office and the American State Department expect Grandi to leave the sinking Fascist ship together with other rats. By betraying Mussolini he would only enhance his prestige among our would-be Machiavellis. This is the reason that Grandi is being told day in and day out, in our press and on our radio, that he would be quite an acceptable "leader" of tomorrow's Italy. As for Ciano, he is the only man through whom Mussolini could be approached personally in negotiations of a secret and delicate kind. The results of such negotiations would be more readily swallowed in this country if Ciano were described in advance as a traitor to his father-in-law. A widespread story that Ciano is even now visiting the United States shows how far the hopes and suspicions have gone.

Among all these rumors the most insistent is the report that the King of Italy will soon abdicate. For the last twenty years the coming abdication of the King of Italy has been announced at least twice a year. To be sure, he may abdicate one fine day and run away to Spain, with or without Mussolini. If that should happen, those who have predicted his abdication for the last twenty years will undoubtedly consider themselves infallible prophets. But that, I am afraid, is questionable logic. At any rate Victor Emanuel is still King of Italy.

Yet the story of his abdication does not deserve to be dismissed altogether. The French journalist Pertinax, a man of uncommon intelligence and as a rule well informed, has given support to the rumor in the New York Times of May 12, though he was judicious enough to add that "the hour at which the King's decision will mature remains uncertain." Since May 12 the story has been repeated again and again by many papers, as though it came from Switzerland, England, Morocco, Dakar, and where not. As a matter of fact, the source of the news is Archbishop Spellman. Pertinax wrote: "The diplomatic reports to which I refer originated in the recent visit of Archbishop Francis J. Spellman of New York to London and in what he said there about the conversations he had had in Rome some weeks before. He was received no less than four times by Pope Pius XII and by the Papal Secretary of State, Cardinal Maglione. He is believed to have met Count Ciano, Count Grandi, and others. Thus his words carry great weight."

We see that again Grandi and Ciano are brought to the fore. In addition, we are told by Pertinax that "the Vatican is deeply concerned with the social upheavals that are likely to be the outcome of military defeat" and thinks a new government "closely linked with the conservative classes" is needed in Italy "to maintain public order." This government, according to "the view generally expressed at the Vatican," should consist of "a young monarch not too directly involved in the tragic errors of Fascist policy." In other words, according to Pertinax, the King of Italy has been informed that he is expected to get out and to leave Crown Prince Humbert in his place if he wants to enjoy the protection of Mr. Roosevelt, Mr. Churchill, and Pius XII.

Perhaps the Vatican, the British Foreign Office, and our own State Department do not understand that if Britain and America win the war, the royal family and the "conservative classes" in Italy are doomed. Neither the present King nor his brainless son, neither Grandi nor Ciano, neither Badoglio nor any other Fascist general, will serve to stem the tide of revolt in Italy. The dream of a "conservative" succession to Mussolini can only be brought to realization if the victorious armies of the Allied powers are assigned the degrading task of establishing in power the renegades of Fascism.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

TWO weeks ago this column pointed out that German publicity about Tunisia had not repeated the mistakes of Stalingrad. For months the people had been prepared for the eventuality that the Tunisian front might have to be given up. Therefore it was only necessary at the end to conceal the fact that defeat took the form, not of an orderly evacuation, but of a complete collapse. This was attempted, successfully or not, by uttering dithyrambs on the glorious heroism of the African troops. Except on that one point the commentators did not need to exert themselves. They had long been representing the Tunisian undertaking as in essence a "delaying" action designed to hold the Anglo-American armies until an Atlantic Wall and a Mediterranean Wall could be built to defend the European fortress. Now it was only necessary to show that this purpose had been accomplished, and the six months' time gained appeared as a victory. The loss of a few divisions was not too high a price to pay.

Of course it will be impracticable to use the same foresight about the next event on the order of the day—the invasion of Europe. Not the most imaginative presentation could make a successful invasion look like a defeat for the Allies. Nevertheless, one section of German propaganda is showing remarkable caution. The military do not speak the same language as Goebbels. Everything that comes out of Goebbels's Ministry is 100 per cent in one vein. Day after day, with a thousand tongues, his people guarantee the complete and unconditional impossibility of any breach, being made in the European fortress. A very different tone, however, is used by the man who can be called the army's chief propagandist, the well-known General Kurt Dittmar.

On the eve of the finale in Tunis the General spoke over the radio. Soon now, he said, the invasion attempt must be expected. And his single comment was the restrained, almost neutral remark: "Let us wait and see whether the Allies are strong enough to crack the hard shell which now protects the south of Europe." No "impossible" from him. Three weeks earlier General Dittmar had spoken on the same subject at greater length, but then too very moderately. He said, "Landings, military history teaches us, are among the most difficult of operations." But he did not fail to add that "military history, nevertheless, does not lack examples of successful landings." He described the new fortified zone along the European coast as "strong in the manner of the West Wall." But he also said that so far in this war "no fortified zone" has withstood a determined attack. He praised the quality of German soldiers, which would give the fortifications a special strength. But even of the best-defended fortress he said only that it "could be" impregnable, not that it was certainly so.

One cannot assert of course that there was any trace of defeatism in the General's remarks. But it is clear that the military gentlemen are beginning to think about their professional reputation. If the invasion should succeed—and they do not exclude the possibility—they do not want to be counted among those who were either absolutely blind or arrant deceivers.

Though Japan may have made capital out of the coal strike and the continued recalcitrance of the United Mine Workers, in Germany the matter has not been pointed up to seem of major importance. The authorities do not like to have strikes discussed, even strikes in enemy countries. However, there is of course a German line on the subject. The light in which the people were expected to view it was indicated by Hans Fritzsche, director of the Radio Ministry, on May 4.

In this version the cause of the conflict was "the eagerness of the Jews and plutocrats to rake in their profits from the war they had instigated." The plutocrats have known how to avoid paying higher war taxes. "War taxes are paid only by the masses. In fact, the United States is the country in which one of the richest men in the world, the lately deceased Morgan, for years paid no taxes at all." This spirit has now seeped down into the lower ranks. "A country in which the war is carried on so openly as a business must reckon with the fact that the desire for profits is not confined to the handful of plutocrats but spreads like a contagion through many groups. In recent months the mine workers among others have been pressing their demands."

Thereupon Roosevelt used the whole power of the state against the workers. And now occurred the most significant event. "Moscow ranged itself against the American miners, who, following the example of the Wall Street Jews and the trust plutocrats, had dared to demand at least a small share in the deceptive prosperity of the war. The representative of Moscow in the United States, the Bolshevik leader Poznoff [sic], turned against Lewis." Thus "Roosevelt's coercive measures were adopted on Moscow's initiative." And suddenly, as if by a dazzling flash of lightning, "the whole front against which National Socialist Germany is fighting became clear. It is the front of the Jewish slaveholders in Moscow and the slaveholders of the so-called Western democracies, which behind an idealistic mask preach dollar imperialism."

How much of this the German listener swallowed—if he was at all interested—is another question.

File and Remember

The Nazi Student Trial

SOMETHING new has happened in Hitler's Germany. The German wireless has announced that all German university students will have to undergo a new test for their political reliability. Only those found worthy will be allowed to continue their studies. All others will be sent to the front.

On February 22 Hans Scholl, Maria Scholl, and Adrian Probst, students at the University of Munich, were sentenced to death for high treason by a Nazi People's Court. Commenting on their execution a few days later, the Völkischer Beobachter called them typische Einzelgänger—typical individual cranks. However, on April 21, exactly a week before the general purge of the universities was announced, the same paper reported another treason trial—this time of thirteen persons. Under the headline, "Just Punishment for Traitors of a Fighting Nation," it said that three other Munich students had been sentenced to death because, "together with the Scholls, they encouraged sabotage in armament factories by means of leaflets during our nation's hard struggle in 1942-43, and also spread defeatist ideas." Two students from Ulm who "assisted in the distribution of these highly treasonable leaflets" were sentenced to "only five years' imprisonment in view of their youth"; four other young persons, one boy and three girls, were sentenced to from twelve to eighteen months' imprisonment for failing to report these activities to the police, and one girl for distributing the leaflets in ignorance of their contents.

The trial was not, however, confined to students. Two men from Freiburg "who did not report these plans" received seven years' penal servitude each, and one from Stuttgart

The Great Hour

Moscow's decision to dissolve the Third International presents labor with a unique opportunity to strengthen its ranks, to unite and prepare itself for leadership in the world of tomorrow. Since the inauguration of expediency in North Africa, we know what kind of democratic order is to be expected from the diplomacy of the United Nations if it is left to its own devices. Only a mobilization of the popular forces—for the support of the war, yes, but also for the establishment of a people's peace—can save mankind from the certainty of World War III. Liberals cannot do it. Isolated statesmen like Benes cannot do it. Labor alone can take the matter into its own hands, become the rallying point for all progressive forces, and smash the conspiracy of big business, Munich diplomacy, and Vatican intrigue which aims to sell out the people and to establish reaction everywhere. It can be done. But only under one condition—that in this decisive hour Labor and Socialist leaders—American, British, European—show themselves capable of rising to the heights of a Debs, a Keir Hardie, a Jaworski; that they show themselves generous and farsighted; that they do not permit their personal resentments, their lack of imagination, their almost pathological fear of action to ruin the immense opportunity now open to them.

"who provided money but did not know all the particulars," ten years.

In the Beobachter's report two facts at once strike the eye. First, the pretense of dealing with "individual cranks" has been dropped; the work of an anti-Nazi underground organization is clearly revealed. Second, the active core of this organization was formed by students in their early twenties—boys and girls who had been children when Hitler came to power. What can have happened to turn them into "traitors" and "defeatists"? What caused such a great response to their activities that a general purge of the universities became necessary?

Some light is shed on the mystery by an unsigned report in the Swedish Vecko-Journalen which says that the trouble started when students at the University of Munich demonstrated against a speech made by Gauleiter Giessler. The next day leaflets taking the incident as a starting-point for a general attack on the Nazi regime were circulated by the students. The first three victims were arrested for distributing these leaflets. Further investigation revealed a ramifying organization, and more arrests followed.

There is not a word in this report about sabotage in armament factories; and if we remember that the Nazi regime always attempts to make opposition to itself appear as treachery to the nation and a direct threat to the war effort, we can easily believe that the Swedish paper published a true account. —Condensed from an article by Paul Sering in the Tribune (London) for May 7, 1943.

Baudelaire, Plain and Mirrored

BAUDELAIRE THE CRITIC. By Margaret Gilman. Columbia University Press. $3.

THE MIRROR OF BAUDELAIRE. Edited by Charles Henri Ford. With a Preface by Paul Eluard and a Drawing by Henri Matisse. New Directions. Boards, $1. Paper, 50 cents.

Baudelaire's ascent "au comble de la gloire" has entailed its inevitable perils. Like other poets rescued from the hostility of their contemporaries or the notoriety of their reputations—like Poe, Hölderlin, Leopardi, Rimbaud, and presently, like Mallarmé, Rilke, and George—he has become the multiplied and divided god of his devotees, a mask to fit every possible convenience or occasion. "Cette grande faveur posthume, cette fécondité spirituelle, cette gloire" have, as Valéry remarked in 1926, enriched both the poet and his heirs, but they have invited a dangerous amount of reckless redaction and distortion of what Baudelaire wrote and thought. Such license has been especially encouraged in England and America, where editions and discussion of his poetry still remain fragmentary and of his prose almost non-existent. Eliot emphasized the situation sixteen years ago when he said that "Baudelaire is one of the few poets who wrote nothing, either prose or verse, that is negligible. To understand Baudelaire you must read the whole of Baudelaire. And nothing that he wrote is without importance. He was a great poet; he was a great critic. And he was also a man with a profound attitude toward life, for the study of which we need every scrap of his writing."

Miss Gilman's book arrives late in the day but no less opportunely. She has written a careful, intelligent, thoroughly documented account of Baudelaire's criticism, by far the best yet attempted in English. It should restore him to general recognition not only as one of the greatest critical intelligences of the past century but as a figure to rank with Coleridge, Schiller, Keats, Delacroix, Hopkins, and Yeats in the evolution of modern romantic aesthetics—a critic and exonerator, possibly superior to any of these, of the romantic principle in the years of crisis and enforced maturity at which it arrived in his lifetime.

Miss Gilman's book is not a substitute for the good translation of Baudelaire's prose which should be made for English readers (her quotations are all in French), but it is the first to make available the encyclopedic scholarship of André Ferran's "Esthétique de Baudelaire," Giovanni Macchia's "Baudelaire Critico," and several lesser European investigators, the first on this side of the Atlantic to canvass the full range of speculation in "L'Art romantique," "Curiosités esthétiques," the "Journaux intimes," what the various "Oeuvres posthumes," and the letters and to show what is of paramount importance—the authentic inclusiveness of Baudelaire's aesthetic intelligence. It was an intelligence that had its center in poetry but it ranged widely: to painting and music, to manners and public prejudices, to both aesthetic problems and psychological, and continuously to social and moral traditions: "dandyisme" ("l'idée du beau transportée dans la vie matérielle, celui qui dicte la forme et règle les manières") was for him as serious an instrument for discriminating the artist's function as the political attitudes that carried him from the bourgeois revolutionary ardor of 1848 to the social misanthropy that claimed him later. The influences that went into the making of Baudelaire's ideas were never narrowly sectarian: De Maistre balanced Poe; Guys, Rops, Daumier, and the satirists balanced Delacroix, Gautier, Manet, and the aesthetes; Diderot, Stendhal, and Ingres balanced Hugo and Wagner. The "universality" he praised in Delacroix was his continuous ideal. In opposition to technical or dogmatic specialization he set one of his most refreshing principles: "Je crois sincèrement que la meilleure critique est celle qui est amusante et poétique."

Miss Gilman rightly emphasizes the fact that in Baudelaire, as in other major critics, it was the poet working through the critic that made his work luminous. She is at no pains to spare him from the biases and occasional miscalculations which his own intense participation in the creative conflicts of his time entailed, but she is able, by elaborate summary, to vindicate his own claim of having transformed his "volupté en connaissance," of having arrived by a scrupulous empirical sincerity at what he could finally claim as "une pensée unique et systématique," and of having achieved the stature of a master in "the most difficult of all criticism, that of one's contemporaries." One has only to compare him in this respect with his only possible peers in the aesthetic or impressionist line in America and England—with Poe, so erratic on living poets, so special a pleader for writers of the kind he desiderated, and with Pater, whose compromise of taste with decorum led to his incredibly imperceptive, not to say callow, reviews of "Robert Elsmere," "Dorian Gray," and Edmund Gosse's verse—to realize what Baudelaire achieved in his estimates of Flaubert, Daumier, Hugo, and Delacroix. If our latter-day distrust of his judgment is based on a reaction against Poe as strong as Baudelaire's pioneer enthusiasm, it should be corrected by the integrity by which Baudelaire lifted himself above friendship, literary politics, distorting fashions, and the erratic taste of his day in order to arrive at judgments on his contemporaries that show—beyond Sainte-Beuve's pontifical tactics and shifts of policy—a classic security.

Miss Gilman's book is weakest in her meager integration of Baudelaire's prose with his poetry. Her methodical annotation also prevents her from opening the full perspectives of her subject by showing the larger ancestry of Baudelaire's ideas, their connection with social and moral influences, and their bearing on modern developments in criticism. Baudelaire stands too much alone in her book, insufficiently connected with the currents and activities he focuses so signally. But her book is urgently to be recommended to all bandiers of his name and greatness, and to those addicts of translation who might profitably turn their energies from his poems to his prose. I would mention a final virtue of her study: she follows a chronological order in her survey, avoiding not only stilted classifications "into artistic, literary, and musical," but also "too sharply defined periods" of personal development. This is the only way to emphasize the continuity and essential unity of Baudelaire's thought and character—the indivisibility of his art and nature that is the first fact of his genius.

In "The Mirror of Baudelaire" the poet becomes a Poet of the Month, and receives one of the handsomest formats in that estimable series. A menstrual emphasis perhaps calls for timeliness: Baudelaire here turns up in one of his most fashionable incarnations, as an ancestor of the surrealists. Paul Eluard leads off with a prose hymn on the poet's image, occasioned by Matisse's line portrait; Mr. Ford, "editor" of the booklet, follows with a "Ballad for Baudelaire" that offers no very impressive testimony on the master's influence in matters of taste, style, or intensity; and William Candlewood (who is mentioned on the jacket but nowhere in the volume itself) supplies translations of "Le Voyage," "Le Cygne," and "Un Voyage à Cythère." A first reading recommends these as a corrective to the mawkish and broken-backed sentimentalizations that extend from Symons to Millay. Closer examination raises doubts, for there is soon apparent a sly stuffing of superfluous epithet, exaggerated adjectives, unwarranted metaphorical extensions, and colloquial equivalents that throw the original phrases off key. "L'horreur de leurs berceaux" becomes "the horror of their hearts"; "La Circé tyrannique aux dangereux parfums" becomes "Oh, the perfumes of Circe, the power and the pig!"; "De leur fatalité jamais ils ne s'écartent" becomes "They never diverge from luck's black sun"; "avec nos voiles blanches" becomes "with the glare of our sails"; "la mer des Ténébres" becomes "the sea of deepening shadows"; and when "Un Voyage à Cythère" becomes "A Voyage to Cytherea" and remains "Cytherea" throughout the poem we are reminded of how Eliot, on once making an effort to grapple with the hash Symons had made of this masterpiece, was led to "wonder even whether Mr. Symons has not confused Cythera with Cytherea." These stepplings-up of Baudelaire's tone and suggestion, these liberties of connotation and touches of Rimbaudian exorbitance, while not excessive in the fashion of many recent versions, tend seriously to break down the balance between personal epithet and classical diction, between originality and tradition, that is essential to any real sense of what both Valéry and Eliot have emphasized as the Racinian element in Baudelaire's art. Since Mr. Candlewood was following neither the rhythms nor the rhymes of the originals, one wonders why he didn't aim at the closest possible exactness and fidelity in his renderings and trust that any interested reader's access to Baudelaire's verbally and syntactically un baffling French would supply the poetry from the one place where it indisputably exists.

Roger Fry's English gloss on Mallarmé remains a useful model for the many poets of our day who, without five minutes' command of common colloquial French or German, are possessed of an itch to "translate" Rimbaud, Baudelaire, Rilke, Eluard, Hölderlin, and other masters of the utmost nuances and subtleties of those tongues. "In the unsilvered glass of Time, we shall always recognize Baudelaire, physically and morally, without ever having seen him," says Mr. Eluard, but it doesn't necessarily follow that we are bound to recognize Baudelaire without having read him.

Fighters Round the World

JOURNEY AMONG WARRIORS. By Eve Curie. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.50.

EVE CURIE'S 40,000-mile trip to war fronts strewn across the globe was more than a reporting journey; it was a personal pilgrimage. The crumbling of her country in the face of the Nazi onslaught had been a humiliation to her; she needed to renew her faith in the courage of men. She wanted the reassurance of seeing how the fight against fascism was being carried on by other peoples.

As a reporter Miss Curie carried good newspaper credentials from England and America. She carried even more potent credentials by reason of being the daughter and biographer of Marie Curie. When Burma was in flames she telephoned a local governor to ask him where she might find lodging for the night; he had read her book about her mother and asked her to be his guest. In Russia Eve Curie got to the front while other reporters still were marooned far back at Kuibyshev. Randolph Churchill, the Prime Minister's son, took her almost too near Nazi tanks in Libya. In China the Chiang Kai-sheks invited her to their home. In India she was the guest of General Wavell.

Few reporters have such opportunities; few, if any, could have made so much of the opportunities as did Eve Curie. Her 500-page book is a grand panorama of the war seen through discerning eyes and described by an honest mind.

For one thing she worked hard and covered things no other reporter has touched. In Russia she not only talked to soldiers and partisans and German prisoners, but also she went to see Dr. Smirnov, son of a glass worker, who had learned to read and write in 1925 and now was chief of the Red Army Medical Service administration. For three hours he told her how Soviet scientists were working to stanch the terrifying flow of Russian blood. She talked to geologists who were seeking new sources of bauxite and experimenting with the best white paints for winter tank camouflage. She talked to scholars who were building alphabets for those of Russia's racial groups which had none.

Never was Miss Curie dizzied by her association with the famous or hobbled by officialdom. Her energy and curiosity were too great. She made it her business to talk to plain people and to those in opposition. In Chungking she saw not only government leaders but also Madame Sun Yat-sen, the Generalissimo's sister-in-law, who, although bitterly sad about some aspects of the Chiang Kai-shek regime, assured her that liberal ideas would not die in China whatever the course of the Kuomintang. Miss Curie managed to get herself furtively spirited to the Chungking home of Chou En-lai, representative of the Chinese Communists, who said the Red troops found Chiang Kai-shek very reluctant to supply them with weapons although they were bearing the brunt of one-third of the Japanese forces on Chinese soil. Still thirsting for knowledge after seeing nearly everyone in the capital, this indefatigable reporter took a difficult trip 180 miles into the northwest to visit Chengtu, capital of Szechwan Province.

In India Miss Curie's interests were equally catholic. She found that except for the Viceroy and Sir Stafford Cripps, none of the English had ever met Gandhi or Nehru, nor did the Congress Party leaders meet the officers of the Moslem League. It simply wasn't done. Miss Curie met them all. When she told General Wavell that she was to walk with Gandhi next morning, he muttered only half-jokingly that he wished he could.

Wherever she went Miss Curie was digging into the meaning of things, seeking answers to questions, not trying to prove any preconceived point. She set down what she saw candidly and objectively. "The fact that I had an incurable worship for personal freedom which the Soviet regime had been offending several times a day while I was in Russia could not hide from me an obvious truth: the German attack, which had made my country, France, fall to pieces within a few weeks—army, regime, and all—had not even shaken the formidable structure of the U. S. S. R." She found not only the soldiers but the whole people making incredible sacrifices gladly. "It was a case of national unity and of powerful leadership," she thought.

The authoritarian aspects of Chiang Kai-shek's regime did not escape Miss Curie. But in China she was able to discuss the government freely with conservatives, Communists, and liberals, whereas in Russia she had not found a single citizen "willing or daring to have a controversial talk about the Russian regime with a foreigner."

She wandered through the slums of Calcutta and was appalled by the degrading poverty which is so widespread under Britain's rule. She found that Gandhi "had more charm than almost anybody I had ever met," but she was appalled by him, too. She admired him, fell under his spell, but came to the conclusion that he "must have no part in the government of India during the war." Eve Curie wholeheartedly sympathized with India's yearning to be independent. But when Indian leaders took the attitude that one foreign master was as bad as another—so why worry about a Japanese conquest?—she thought they were pitifully underestimating fascist brutality. The apathy and factional disputes reminded her all too vividly of pre-war France. Non-violence would never beat Hitler.

By and large Miss Curie's visits to the battle fronts of the anti-Nazi coalition cheered her. In the Russian town of Tula, which had not surrendered to the besieging troops of Napoleon, nor of Denekin, nor of Hitler, she asked the commissar how they managed to hold out. "One saves a besieged city," he replied, "by swearing that the enemy will not get into it." Men with this spirit were likely to win. So were the soldiers of Chou En-lai in China who sang:

All you who don't want to be slaves,
Arise!
Let's take our flesh and blood
And build a great new world.

Eve Curie's spirit was lifted by the faith of the fighting men she met and by their determination that the association of many varied peoples in the war against Nazism must not be allowed to collapse in the peace to come. But she still put quotation marks around half of the phrase "United" Nations. She was anxious about the people behind the fronts. Were they consolidating the coalition, "materially so strong, politically so fragile," while there was still time to do so? Were they "building a coherent, workable plan for a new world, that would even partly satisfy the hunger of 1,500 million men for liberty, for security—and for bread?"

MARCUS DUFFIELD

Cities for Use

NEW YORK PLANS FOR THE FUTURE. By Cleveland Rodgers. Harper and Brothers. $3.

THIS book will tell you how New York City got the way it is. The story of the use and misuse of land, with all the effects of expansion, overcrowding, speculation, official and unofficial chicanery upon ways of living and working is told in full. It began earlier than we think. Peter Stuyvesant passed a law to force owners to build on vacant lots—almost the same law radical New Zealand is so proud of today. It didn't work. The first premature subdivision was made in 1789, 'way out where Thirty-fourth and Forty-second streets are now. As the city grew, expenses grew even faster, and the city sold off its land and gave up its leasehold rights. The endeavor to finance capital costs by selling capital assets proved a failure because operating costs mounted still faster and taxes could not keep pace. So ever new land was opened up, and new "taxable values" were created, and here we are with a stabilizing population and one-third of our land vacant, one-third of the developed land in streets, and with great areas of blight and decay handicapping the rest. We are talking about municipal ownership, leaseholds, government aid, and we listen carefully to Minister Nash of New Zealand.

The story is not unique. Most of our large cities have gone through the same process. The impact of the involved forces of economics, politics, and social climates on the plan of the city has not been elsewhere so well described. Homer Hoyt's "100 Years of Land Values in Chicago" is too technical, and the usual histories do not show the relation of these forces to the physical city of today. Cleveland Rodgers shows how all these events and their physical residue affect the ordinary city dweller, the man who travels two hours daily by subway, the woman who has no safe place for her child to play in, the child whose life is spent on asphalt streets and asphalt playgrounds. It is such simple human things that are the real basis of the disintegration of the city, these and the impossibility of carrying on the business life of today in an obsolete plant. It is these things that must be remedied; everything else is secondary because if the city is not made over for the living and working of its inhabitants, no municipal economies, no "tax reforms," no "urban rehabilitation" (for the upper middle class) will have any effect.

What emerges is the need of a definite plan for the control of land use, which means not only a physical plan but economic and legislative plans as well. Commissioner Rodgers unfortunately shies away from this prospect. He allows the implications of the past to remain implications.

The charter revisionists had high hopes for the City Planning Commission as an instrument of public service. It was even as non-political a form as possible, and extraordinary powers and directives. Besides its day-to-day work of molding the city through zoning and its control of the City Map, it is required to set up a continuing five-year budget of capital expenditures, thus correlating the work of all the city departments. And in the still further view it is supposed to prepare a master-plan for its own control of immediate purposes, to guide the future growth of the city, and to educate and enlighten the public as to what the city might become.

It is this master-plan that Mr. Rodgers somehow fails to tell enough about, nor does he speak of its virtual abandonment since the departure of Rexford Tugwell. He is content to praise the "military leader who concentrates on limited objectives . . . without disclosing the larger purposes of strategy." Granting the enormous accomplishment, high devotion, and ability of tactical leaders, the fact remains that the citizen is not a soldier and might reasonably be interested in strategy. Mr. Rodgers points out time and again that the major errors of the past were not the result of malevolence or dishonesty, but of uninformed and arbitrary judgment where there was no basic plan or policy of land use against which judgments could be compared or stabilized. The future New York is likely to render the same verdict about super-duper highways and super-density housing projects and other "improvements" unless they are related to some ultimate concept of what the city should be, some philosophy of planning expressed in the form of an over-all pattern of use.

It would be desirable, too, that this philosophy be informed with a mature outlook and positive belief about the social and economic future. Mr. Rodgers feels very strongly about the social aspects, and his book is full of the imperative necessity of making New York a decent place in which to live and bring up children. But the economic and legal aspects seem to baffle him, and so no plan of action emerges other than faith in the plans of men of action who act without plan.

This bafflement has been felt by others, by liberals who are afraid of the democratic process and by conservatives who are fearful of the democrats. It leads, in city planning, to Hausmannism, which was all very well in its day and in Paris. Something quite different is needed here and now, a master-plan for New York based on the thinking of planners in all fields—city planning, law, finance, sociology, health, and all the rest of the disciplines that go to make up the complex of a metropolis. If the Planning Commission is too circumscribed in outlook and too hampered by lack of funds and too bedeviled by discordant pressures, then a citizens' organization must do it. The Regional Plan of New York did it once, and in spite of some shortcomings did a basic and fruitful job. It needs to be revised in the light of new concepts—any plan needs constant revision, or it is not a plan but a blueprint, and a blueprint is something fixed, dead. "New York Plans for the Future" should convince everyone interested in his city that the only way to prevent the confusion of the past from becoming the future is to insist that the planning function of the commission be continued. Mr. Rodgers, who has high intelligence, perspective, a social outlook, and, as this book demonstrates, a gift for informing the public, should lead the way.

Civilians in the Blitz

FRONT LINE: THE OFFICIAL STORY OF THE CIVIL DEFENSE OF BRITAIN. The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

THE Battle of Britain was won not only miles high in the air where the Spitfires hunted the enemy but down on the ground, in the streets and homes and factories. Göring tacitly acknowledged defeat not merely by the R. A. F. but at the hands of the people of Britain, who failed to break under a rain of high explosives and fire, who carried on despite death and destruction.

"Front Line," the official account of that victory, is one of the remarkable series of books which the British government has published in the past two years. They are reports to the people written with great skill and beautifully produced, and they have sold in numbers which reduced ordinary best-seller figures to insignificance. Earlier titles include "Fighter Command," "Bomber Command," and "The Abyssinian Campaigns."

Now we have the story of how Britain "took it" during the blitz and emerged physically and morally stronger than before. It is first-class reporting, well on the sober side, but numerous illustrations, brilliantly selected, supply a comment more eloquent than a dictionary of adjectives. Some have an awful beauty, like that of the flaming spire of St. Clement Danes; some are breath-taking, like that of a burning building caught by the camera halfway in its crash to the ground; some are tender, like that of the mother bending over her sleeping child in the underground shelter. They are not, perhaps, a complete record, for the British are reticent about publishing pictures of the starkest horrors of war such as the Russians sometimes release, but only the unimaginative would ask for still more realism.

It was the British people as a whole who fought the blitz by keeping their heads, by sticking to their jobs, and by helping each other in emergencies. It was the army of civil defenders, one and a half million strong, who bore much of the immediate brunt of the attack. Like a military force they were divided into various branches. The great body of wardens can be compared, perhaps, to the infantry. During the period of "phony war," when their chief duty was to enforce the blackout, they were the victims of many jokes and sneers. But when the test came they proved to be the pillars of the whole civil-defense organization. It was their job to act as "the eyes and ears" of the control centers so that the right kind of help was sent to the right place. But equally important was their role as "good neighbors" always ready to give comfort, advice, and leadership to the people on their beats.

The fire-fighters may be compared to the artillery. Their work was spectacular, arduous, and extremely dangerous since the German habit was to drop high explosives into the midst of fires. The sappers in this civilian army were the men who tunneled into wrecked buildings to rescue occupants who were alive but trapped—a highly skilled job and no sinecure, for they always faced the possibility of being buried themselves, and broken gas and water mains provided additional hazards. Another branch of the sappers helped to clear streets, repair telephone and electric cables, plug leaks in burning gas-holders, and generally thwart the enemy's attempts to bring urban life to a standstill. And there were other specialized services—the signal corps of telephonists and messengers, the first-aid workers, the quartermaster's department, which brought refreshment to fire-fighters and rescue squads and rushed mobile canteens wherever homeless people needed food. Finally, there were the regular and auxiliary police, who not only attended to their normal duties but gave a hand wherever it was needed.

This army proved to be highly disciplined—it had to be—but it was not the kind of automatic discipline which enables a mass of men to charge the enemy. The civil defenders worked in small groups, or on their own, and each carried his own burden of responsibility. The organization as a whole was decentralized and closely tied in with the machinery of local government. In practice it proved more flexible than might have been expected and readily adaptable to new situations.

Britain still suffers from air raids—172 people were killed and 205 injured in April—but the real blitz petered out in the summer of 1941. During that period casualties were heavy, although not nearly so numerous as had been anticipated, while the damage to property and particularly homes was immense. But there was no knockout as Göring had confidently expected. This book helps to explain why.

KEITH HUTCHISON

McMaster and the Usable Past

JOHN BACH McMASTER. By Eric F. Goldman. University of Pennsylvania Press. $2.

MR. GOLDMAN observes that John Bach McMaster put himself to writing a history of the United States with the same energy and single-mindedness that his contemporaries Rockefeller and Carnegie gave to oil and iron. The comparison is apt. McMaster was, in his social outlook, a thorough conservative. During his many years of public influence he served in the press and on the platform as one of the intellectual bulwarks of the status quo. At the same time, as a professor at the University of Pennsylvania, he set American social history on its feet, and wrote books which a correspondent informed him, "are more and more attracting the attention of the laboring classes." The contradiction between his personal point of view and his historical method warrants understanding. It throws an interesting light on the problem of discovering a "usable" American past.

McMaster's great work is entitled (the italics are added) "A History of the People of the United States." McMaster was himself one of the "people," a product of Brooklyn and the public schools. He never attended a seminar in history till he directed one, and never studied abroad. His first positions included working with a topographical survey of Civil War battlefields, tutoring students, and writing technical books for a science series. He began his teaching career as an instructor in civil engineering.

McMaster early became dissatisfied with then current standards in American history, its emphasis upon statesmen and military campaigns; and he undertook a life-long discipline of poring over old journals and pamphlets for news of America as it had been. It is not difficult to see why the first volume of his history, when it was published in 1883, should have been a best-seller. His work constitutes a vast notebook about common life in the pre-Civil War decades. Such subjects as "Housemaids," "Insecurity of the mails; use of ciphers," "Rage for lotteries" were developed at the expense of heroes and public issues. Moreover, his focus, as his biographer points out, was comparatively national rather than sectional.

Mr. Goldman's extended analyses of McMaster's work are likely to interest the scholar more than the general reader, but they help clarify the historian's contribution to his craft. His passion for democracy impelled him to seek out the ordinary, illuminating facts about former times, but his democracy was tuned entirely in terms of the past. For his own day, facts became a means for building partisan arguments. Reduced to their lowest terms, they could result in such a scissors-and-paste job as McMaster's history of America during the First World War.

Mr. Goldman writes well, and his judgments on McMaster are consistently accurate. McMaster's approach to American history is indeed dated in some respects. It is possible to overemphasize the importance of detail in American life. But his basic respect for what went before, his willingness to take other times and customs on their own terms, still offers as good a way as any to understand the past in order to use it properly.

Re Germany's Historic Guilt

THE THOUSAND-YEAR CONSPIRACY: SECRET GERMAN BEHIND THE MASK. By Paul Winkler. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.75.

THE theme of this book is by now a familiar one. It is not only that Germany and the Germans are by nature innately disposed to military conquest and brutality toward their fellow-men, but that World War II is the direct and planned result of a conscious plot elaborated over many decades and even centuries. Leopold Schwarzschild has recently documented the processes of this supposed plot with special emphasis on the twenty years between the Treaty of Versailles and the Hitler attack on Poland. The late Roussy de Sales analyzed what he believed to be the inner qualities of soul which have impelled Germans through the ages to rebel against civilization. Mr. Winkler, who is introduced by his publishers as the founder of Europe's largest newspaper-feature syndicate and as Edouard Herriot's adviser in press matters, traces the plot back to the Teutonic Order of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. He undertakes to show that those pious gangsters who conquered East Prussia and points east wore the Holy Cross on their breasts only as a front for their plot to establish the Hooked Cross as their symbol of domination over the entire world.

Mr. Winkler brings to his exposition a wealth of fascinating lore concerning the ways and customs of these marauders—doings grimly akin to those of the Nazis in 1943 in Poland. He recounts the efforts of the Hohenstauffen emperors to make the Vatican a servant of the Teutonic state. And he emphasizes the transition of the Hohenstauffen pretension through Bull of Rimini by Frederick II to the "Prusso-Teutonic group," which authorized them to exercise in North Europe the claims that Frederick was relinquishing in Italy. It is all very interesting and, to this reviewer, pretty remote.

Mr. Winkler then traces the spirit and even the ancestral blood of the Teutonic Order and its Junker parasites through the Great Elector and Frederick the Great down to Bismarck, and then through Wilhelm II and Weimar to Hitler. Hitler, the reader is invited to infer, is the supreme incarnation of what the Teutonic gangsters had planned all along. Mr. Winkler picks all the expected quotations from List and Treitschke and Bernhardi, and from the German democrats like Kotzebue who denounced them. Yet he does not, to the judicious reader, succeed in indicting the German people. And he hardly succeeds in building up a satisfactory detective-story image of a sinister plot.

Mr. Winkler, like his colleagues in the promulgation of this thesis, achieves his effect by ignoring all historical elements that might embarrass it. He does not suggest that Germany was a part of the entire stream of European history—and a very muddy stream it was. He hardly mentions the courageous struggles of the German people from time to time to achieve democracy. His documentation is strictly selective.

It may well be that books undertaking to demonstrate the unique depravity of the German people will presently go their way with those Hitler-inspired opera which demonstrate the unique inferiority of all non-German races. Mr. Winkler's is one of the best of a bad breed.

IN BRIEF

A SATIRE AGAINST MANKIND AND OTHER POEMS. By John Wilmot, Earl of Rochester. New Directions. $1.

For the latest of its "Poets of the Year" series, New Directions has issued this brief selection of poems by Rochester, seventeenth-century moralist and rake, whose work is now out of print and difficult to obtain. The book has been beautifully printed by Jacob Hammer; and Harry Levin, known for his recent study of Joyce, has selected and edited the poems and contributed an illuminating preface.

THE SWORD ON THE TABLE: THOMAS DORR'S REBELLION. By Winfield Townley Scott. The Poet of the Month Series. New Directions. $1.

A hundred years ago Thomas Dorr, believing himself duly elected governor of Rhode Island by vote of all the people, led a rebellion against the vested and propertied interests represented by Governor King and his crowd in Newport. This rebellion, however nobly motivated, seems from Mr. Scott's verse account, to have been an inept, foolishly conducted, and pathetic affair; so that its value as propaganda for the people's cause is somewhat dubious, and the demands it imposes on a work of art seem to require more extensive and elaborate treatment than this summary version permits. To revive forgotten American annals is a task that should not be left entirely to historians; the poet who undertakes it needs to feel very sure, however, that he does so with genuine emotion, not merely from meretricious opportunism or the advantage of performing a popular exploit. He must also be sure that his material justifies his expenditure of research and talent.

GREAT BRITAIN UNDER PROTECTION. By Frederic Benham. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

This volume is the latest in the Commercial and Tariff History Series published under the auspices of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. After explaining why Great Britain adopted protection in 1931, Mr. Benham closely examines the tariff, imperial preference, and other forms of protection, concluding that protection was hardly a significant factor in economic recovery. The main cause, he believes, was the low price of imported foodstuffs, which made purchasing power available for other expenditures. A documented, somewhat nostalgic statement of the case for free trade.

MODERN JAPAN AND SHINTO NATIONALISM. A Study of Present-Day Trends in Japanese Religions. By D. C. Holton. University of Chicago Press. $2.

This sobering book, based on the Hassell lectures at the University of Chicago, is not merely for students of religion. It shows the religion of conquest stemming from the remotest sources of Japanese history and permeating every detail of national life and thought. Total war for Japan is total indeed, and unless victory is made equally total the problem of Japan may remain.

ANGLOSAXONY. A LEAGUE THAT WORKS. By Wyndham Lewis. Bruce Humphries. $1.

In his usual stimulating style Wyndham Lewis declares that for all practical purposes "democracy" is simply the way the English-speaking peoples work, that our parliaments are in full working order, and that we are the greatest political force in the world. Let's put all we have got into it, and let other people take it or leave it. He seems to think they will be inclined to take it.

FOREVER YOUNG: A LIFE OF JOHN KEATS. By Blanche Colton Williams. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.50.

Dr. Williams's book covers the life of Keats from April 14, 1817, to February 24, 1821, with an occasional flashback to earlier periods. The author makes no claim to special competence as scholar, as critic, or as poet; moreover, she does not write very well. This biography, therefore, like many lives of many poets, is most interesting when the subject is presented in direct quotation, either from his poems or his letters. In these Keats comes through in bright and naked sense; elsewhere, when Dr. Williams dresses him up, refurbished, with whatever warrant, in shreds and patches of his own ideas, torn from their natural context, he seems not so much forever young, as forever quaint, forever literary. When will writers realize that the method that tries to make a biography read almost like a novel, the "fictionalized biography," is, at best, a semiasinine approach? If the sesquicentennial of Keats's birth, still two years away, is made the occasion of any general celebration, there may, if the harvest is large, be published books on Keats that will render all previous volumes obsolete; but "Forever Young" is decidedly not in that category.

ART

SPRING SALON FOR YOUNG ARTISTS. At Art of This Century, 30 West Fifty-seventh Street, until June 26.

This is a show of artists under thirty-five years old. It is a good one, and for once the future reveals a gleam of hope. They are all promising, and some, like I. Rice Periera, are more than that. Her Composition, No. 30, which gives the impression of one abstraction neatly painted over another and precisely complementing it, is the best thing here. There are other pleasures. C. Dilworth has an Object-Collage, No. 8, that is funny as well as pretty. Matta copies himself even more superbly than usual. Perle Fine, a name to conjure with, Robert Motherwell, Fannie Hillsmith, and Ralph Rosenberg, each show small paintings which it would be a pleasure to own. Baziotes, who had a picture in the last exhibition, has two tenebrous ones in this, and there is a large painting by Jackson Pollack which, I am told, made the jury starry-eyed.

IVES TANGUY, RECENT PAINTINGS, AND CALDER CONSTELLATIONS. At the Pierre Matisse Gallery, 41 East Fifty-seventh Street, until June 5.

There is nothing any more "recent" about these Tanguy paintings than there ever has been; if you already like Tanguy you will probably enjoy these empty skies and cluttered shores. The Calder on the other hand have changed. They balance and sway as delicately as before. The color which on metal often seemed an added and unnecessary thing is natural on wood. Mr. Calder treats sculpture like an engineer and produces fairy-tale objects.

MEMORY AND PROPHECY, PAINTINGS BY MRS. IRVING T. BUSH. At the Grand Central Fifth Avenue Galleries, Hotel Gotham, Fifth Avenue, at Fifty-fifth Street, until June 2.

Mrs. Bush says of her work, "They move my hand up and down and onward, across and sideways in all directions, as if measuring out the perspective. . . . They work rapidly and never fail to improve me when I do not respond readily or if I am in any way inattentive. Suddenly I will find my hand poised over the canvas, motionless. When I ask what is the matter, They say: 'If we were able, we would box your ears.' At that They haven't done such a bad job, considering that spirit guides are not so much interested in art as in impressing their omniscience on this faulty world. If Their technique lacks subtlety, They make up for it by a dashing sense of design and a horrific imagination.

JEAN CONNOLLY

MUSIC

N. B. C.'s Studio 8H, which used to be acoustically dead, has been made live and reverberant; and this has improved the sound of the N. B. C. Symphony that comes out of a good radio; but the all-important balances in Debussy's "La Mer"—the balances of bits of sound at each point, producing the right composite sound—came out altered, presumably by the placing and operation of the microphones. In the studio the sound of the orchestra, which used to be dry and hard, now has a brilliance that gets to be harsh and noisy. One can hear that a superb orchestra is playing Tchaikovsky's "Pathétique" under Toscanini; but how great an orchestra one discovers only when the sound of the performance acquires spaciousness, clarity, warmth, and richness in the acoustic conditions of Carnegie Hall.

It is a great orchestra because of its personnel—especially the young virtuosos in its string sections—and because of the training it gets from Toscanini ("You can quote me on this," said one of them excitedly after the last rehearsal of "La Mer": "We come here to go to school."). And it would be even greater if it played only under him. Part of the time it works with Toscanini, who constantly exhorts it to "play correct"—by which he means holding the tempo steady and playing every note exactly as the composer directs in the score. And some of his exhortation and labor for this purpose is made necessary by the fact that most of the time the orchestra works with other conductors, including Stokowski, who tells it that the written notes of the score are nothing, that performance must be creative, must be improvised. For Stokowski's pronouncement translated into practice results in unprecise execution which makes it more difficult for the orchestra to achieve the precision Toscanini demands. Of a scale written for eighteen violins, for example, it makes a thrilling upward slide of gorgeous violin sound that is a composite of eighteen different scales; and this sort of thing demoralizes the orchestra for a conductor who regards the scale as a series in which each sound is produced by the eighteen violins exactly in unison.

Verdi has something to say about "conductors' inspiration" and "creative activity in every performance" in his letters. "I want only one single creator, and I shall be quite satisfied if they perform simply and exactly what he has written. The trouble is that they do not confine themselves to what he has written. I often read in the papers about effects that the composer never could have thought of; but . . . I have never found such a thing. . . . I deny that either singers or conductors can 'create,' or work creatively—this, as I have always said, is a conception that leads to the abyss. . . . Shall I give you an example? You spoke to me recently in praise of an effect that Mariani achieved in the Overture to 'La Forza del Destino' by having the brass enter fortissimo on G. Now then, I disapprove of this effect. These brasses, intended to be mezza voce, could not express anything but the Friar's song. Mariani's fortissimo completely changes the character of the passage, and turns it into a warlike fanfare." And elsewhere he insists on "enunciation and keeping in tempo. . . . That is the way the opera is written, and if you expect any success that is the way it will have to be performed." One finds in the volume other instances of identical attitudes that explain Toscanini's devotion to Verdi; from these two instances one understands why he presented the volume to the members of the N. B. C. Symphony (but one doesn't understand his failure to see that Mussorgsky's rights as the real and only creator of his music were violated by Rimsky-Korsakov's changes of his melody and harmony).

It is a young orchestra; and its string sections contain a number of the outstandingly talented young musicians whose capacities and expectations as solo and chamber music players have been defeated in a concert world organized by the two huge block-booking concert-management monopolies for the commercial exploitation of established big names, not for the proper use and nurture of young talent. When it is an old orchestra, and when these young musicians have played for many years, mostly under second-rate conductors, third-raters, complete phonies, charlatans, and demagogues, they may be the hard-boiled, blasé, arrogant orchestral players that some musicians become; they may write me, as Mr. Calmen Fleissig of the New York Philharmonic did last November, about what orchestral players suffer from prima donna conductors like Toscanini. But at present they are still young musicians for whom the musical experiences they have with Toscanini are worth the exhausting effort he demands from them and the occasional rages they must take from him; who at the end of that rehearsal of "La Mer" burst into a storm of applause in appreciation of the imaginative insight and technical powers that had translated the baffling score, with all its bits of figuration and color and all its nuances of pace, into the coherent and stunningly magnificent form in sound; and who a week earlier, at a rehearsal of the program of popular favorites, grinned their delight at the phrasing and shaping that made things like the Overture to "Zampa" sound "as fresh and glistening as creation itself," and were moved to applause by the inflection of the long cantilena of the Haydn Serenade.

This was only one of several unusual programs with which Toscanini balanced his Brahms cycle. Another was the Verdi program, exciting as a demonstration of a style of performance which revealed the dramatic power, eloquence, and nobility of the early music from "Nabucco" and "I Lombardi" as well as the more familiar "Forza del Destino" and "Traviata." Also there were two programs of American works, which left one trying to figure out why, after not playing American music all these years, he should finally play so much that was bad; or, if he played pieces as good—each in its own way—as Griffes's "White Peacock" and Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" now, why he hadn't played them years before; or, if he played a piece by Loeffler, why it was the feeble "Memories of My Childhood" rather than one of the earlier, more characteristic, and better works like "Poem" or "A Pagan Poem." I found the performance of the orchestral part of Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" superb, but the solo piano part excessively mannered. As for the Brahms performances they were the finest he has ever given here and the finest I can conceive of anyone giving.

Possibly Toscanini could be induced to devote some of his next year's broadcasts to a Mozart cycle, and one of them to Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet," which was not broadcast when he performed it with the Philharmonic. You might write and ask him.

Fischer to Culbertson

Dear Sirs: Mr. Culbertson is quite right: I do not know how to play solitaire. I have only seen it played. I thank him for the lesson in cards. I am also grateful to him for replying politely to my criticism of his World Federation Plan. But he does me an injustice in suggesting that I have not read the plan. I read it twice from first word to last, never omitting a single word. My article on the plan grew out of a book review. I will not say whether it is conscientiousness or cowardice that makes me read every word of a book I review. Especially when I feel compelled to write an unfavorable review I am afraid that the author of the book or somebody else will come and exclaim: But how could you write so-and-so when on page 127 the book declares such-and-such? I did not slight Mr. Culbertson by skimming through his plan. I rejected it after careful reading and careful weighing.

Because my article was a long review of someone else's book I did not feel called upon to present my own plan for peace. I may do that on another occasion. I believe, however, that to point out error serves a constructive purpose. Before we can move forward to a desirable peace we must know which roads do not lead to peace. I think Mr. Culbertson's plan would lead to trouble.

Mr. Culbertson's reply does not answer my arguments. I said that American control of the Dutch West Indies, Indo-China, Siam, and the Pacific islands would be imperialism. He says it would be akin to having bases on Cuba and Bermuda. That is not so. We have bases in Bermuda, but so have the British. In the Malaysian Federation we and nobody else would have bases. Since the first attribute of sovereignty is the right of self-protection, it is incorrect to say that "the full sovereignty of other nations would be safeguarded."

Mr. Culbertson, hedging, now contends that the big powers will keep their strategic zones (Malaysia, India, eastern Poland, etc.) only until the World Federation is organized, and then presumably surrender those zones. Now who is the dreamer? If the United States will need the protection of a Pacific strategic zone thousands of miles from our coasts at the very moment when Japan has been smashed and forced to her knees in unconditional surrender, why should we expect that America would relinquish that zone later on?

Incidentally, where did Culbertson get "Mr. Fischer's seventy-odd simultaneous people's revolutions"? I never mentioned or suggested them.

To me, long-term, peace-time American military and naval control of Malaysia is imperialism. Culbertson is proud of it. I'm sorry.

Mr. Culbertson's quota-force scheme is squarely built on the readiness of the Soviet government, the United States government, and every other government to allow a World Federation to own and operate all big munitions plants inside their countries. I expressed the opinion that the Soviet government certainly would not permit this, and that the American and British governments were unlikely to permit it. Mr. Culbertson does not even try to answer this objection.

Mr. Culbertson wishes to "segregate the means of making war." That is right. He would segregate them in the hands of the big powers, which, he himself admits, are the kind of units which have always made the wars of the past. Nothing in the Culbertson plan, as I pointed out in my original article, offers a means of coping with those great powers. And that is the central problem of maintaining peace. I showed that the Mobile Corps of the small nations would be no match for the big countries.

Quite unnecessarily, Culbertson waxes dramatic about the inability of the people to protect themselves against tyrants. I agree with him. Why all the excitement? I never mentioned this subject in my article. I assumed that every politically literate person knew it. It is bad debating to set up your own argument and then knock it down.

I haven't the space in these letter columns to deal with other Culbertson points. The essential difference between Culbertson's attitude and mine is this: he thinks it is realistic to accept the expansionist appetites of some governments and the status quo tendencies of others and to build a post-war plan on those assumptions. I believe that it is my duty to fight those appetites and tendencies and to make my contribution toward arousing public sentiment against them. Culbertson bows to what is. "Has Fischer talked with any of our Senators?" he asks. What does that mean?

It means that some of our Senators would oppose a solid peace. Culbertson therefore proceeds to formulate a defective peace because he thinks he can get the Senators to approve. I say, oppose such Senators, put public pressure on them to change their policies. The imperialist governments, the narrow nationalistic governments, the domestic reactionaries and isolationists do not need Culbertson to draft a bad peace for them. They can do it themselves. They are already doing it. There is only one chance in 178,000 that they will adopt Culbertson's plan. The danger is that well-intentioned individuals will be misled into thinking that Culbertson's scheme is a desirable one and will work for it without realizing that the concessions he makes to the reactionary lovers of the status quo would, if ever adopted, lead to another war.

LOUIS FISCHER

Each Man His Own Vine and Fig Tree

Dear Sirs: A strange and incredible story—this effort to discredit the New York Times's American History survey by belittling the importance of the Homestead Act.

Is it possible that on this 71st anniversary of President Lincoln's signing of the Homestead Act, we have nothing to offer but jeers?

The Homestead Act of 1862 was a major event in our history, but it is reserved for one R. N. Stromberg to suggest, in your letter columns of May 15, that the disposal by the government of more than a quarter of a billion acres of land was something that, "if anyone celebrated, it was the moneyed speculators of Wall Street."

Mr. Stromberg makes four sweeping statements, all of which are wholly wrong.

1. He says that I am concerned with a "worship of pure 'facts,' and have a disdain for interpretative accounts." This is more than ridiculous. It is fantastic. Repeatedly, I have urged in and out of the public prints that we need both facts and interpretation. My objection to Teachers' College, Columbia, and the National Council for the Social Studies is that they are stressing classroom materials that emphasize interpretations to the neglect of the facts, when, in truth, we need both.

2. He says that the "traditional historical legend" is that the Homestead Act was "the successful climax of a thirty-year struggle," and that it "gave to millions the right to stake their own claim in the public lands." But he says "the facts are otherwise" and then cites Professor Paul Gates as his authority.

But Professor Gates does not hasten to oblige. Indeed, in "The Illinois Central Railroad and Its Colonization Work," Professor Gates says (p. 310): "The movement of population . . . was due not only to railroad and state emigration activities, but also to the existence of free land available to all citizens under the Homestead Act. This act, passed after a long and bitter struggle, provided for the granting of free homesteads of 160 acres" (my italics).

Likewise (on page 313) Professor Gates states that "had the Homestead Act not been in effect, the land sales of the Illinois Central Railroad would have been greater." Did Wall Street rejoice over this? To suggest it did is as absurd as to suggest that I am "obviously pleading somebody's special cause." I must confess, however, I am engaged in a deep, dark, sinister conspiracy to have American history taught in our schools.

3. Mr. Stromberg states that such "modern investigators as Professor Paul Gates have convinced all informed students that the Homestead Act did not end speculation in lands." The obvious inference is that I think it did. Not once—not even by the most remote inference—did I suggest that the Homestead Act ended speculation in the public lands.

Obviously, Mr. Stromberg, like General Grant, wears of long sentences. In my original letter I defended the Times' survey question about the minimum price of the public lands ($1.25) on the ground that it would be impossible for one to know much about the background of the great depression of 1837 without knowing the cheap price for which government lands sold to all comers. For his benefit, I wish to say that the words "Homestead Act" and "depression of 1837" are two different terms; in fact, they do not begin with the same letter of the alphabet.

4. Mr. Stromberg says I am unaware of Professor Gates's work on the Western land question, and this fact is "thus doubly damning." It so happens I am very familiar not only with his book on the Illinois Central Railroad but also with his comments on many other phases of the public-land question. Indeed, I have had his work on the Illinois Central Railroad and its land-colonization schemes on my shelf for five years. It appeared in 1934. If Mr. Stromberg would consult a more recent study by Gustavus Myers (1939) of how the railroads looted the public lands and charged settlers high sums for lands sought for farming, he would not belittle the one great bright spot in the whole picture—the Homestead Act of 1862.

The apologists for the railroads will not tell you this, but the Homestead Act, with all its flaws, came nearer to the ideal of "each man under his own vine and fig tree" than any other event in American history.

Old Hickory Was Right

Dear Sirs: The seventh President of the United States, Andrew Jackson, considered that the United States Bank wielded too much power and was a menace to the liberties of the people under a democratic form of government. Jackson would not vote to extend the franchise for the United States Bank of his day.

Since then many people in the United States have held the same opinion of the banks that Jackson did. There is good reason for this opinion. Too many bank officials have absconded with the people's money. Too many banks have failed, and the depositors have lost all their deposits.

Once we deposited our money in the banks and our checks were honored; now if we have less than $200 in the bank we have to pay for our banking. Formerly we received 3 per cent interest on saving accounts; now we only receive 1 per cent, but if we borrow money from the bank we must pay 6 or 8 per cent. Now if we cash a check drawn on a bank outside the locality in which we live, ten cents is charged for the exchange.

In our city of Vallejo the banks are charging ten cents for cashing government checks. I presume the banks are also doing so in other places, though the government deposits funds to meet these checks and the government checks have always been legal tender. I think this fee is illegal. I suggest that all persons interested should write letters to their Senators and Congressmen about this. No wonder many people hold the banks in disrespect.

Like Shylock these banks must have their pound of flesh (profit) no matter if the common people do suffer.

Who Started It?

Dear Sirs: I believe that the editorial comment on the All-India Moslem League in The Nation of May 8 will by its omissions and one-sidedness prove very misleading.

You quote Jinnah to the effect that the real issue in India is not Britain's preventing an agreement but Britain's prospective attempt to "force Moslems and Hindus into a common federation." You subscribe to Herbert L. Matthews's "modest conclusion" that the League's challenge "immensely strengthens the British contention that the people of India cannot seem to get together." And you conclude that the League's impressive show of strength in its latest annual session "has come close to justifying England's war-time policy."

It was Britain's introduction of the pernicious system of communal voting that first accentuated the normal differences between the Hindus and Moslems. It was her policy of preparing and patronizing princes, minorities, and vested interests, according to the shifting exigencies of the political situation, which encouraged them to raise demands that thwart all attempts at unity. It was essentially Britain's refusal to part with substantial political power that torpedoed the Cripps mission and heightened internal tension. And it was the subtle and indirect recognition of "Pakistan" (Partition) in the Cripps proposal that encouraged the Moslem League to make Pakistan its sacred and inviolable political platform.

What has Britain been doing recently to draw the League and the Congress closer? Rajagopalachari, after his talks with Jinnah, entertained great hopes of effecting a compromise—if only he could see Gandhi. Preposterous, said the omniscient and omnipotent Viceroy. You cannot see Gandhi. No one, not even President Roosevelt's personal envoy, shall see Gandhi. No wonder that Jinnah, while assailing Gandhi, also "accused the British of trying to keep the Moslems and Hindus apart, not wishing to have a settlement between these two great parties" (part of a Reuter dispatch of April 24 ignored by the press, including The Nation).

The Russo-Polish "Wound"

Dear Sirs: It seems to me that your article of May 8 attributes an altogether excessive share of the responsibility for "the Russo-Polish wound" to the allegedly reactionary character of the Polish government-in-exile. There are three circumstances in the situation which, I think, are just cause for resentment to the great majority of Poles, in Poland and abroad, regardless of the character of their political and economic views:

1. The Soviet claim to the eastern regions of Poland, seized after the cynical Stalin-Hitler pact, is singularly weak in both moral and legal justification. The Polish eastern frontier was recognized not only by the freely negotiated Treaty of Riga, in 1921, but by various non-aggression pacts concluded between the Soviet Union and Poland, at the initiative of the former, during the thirties. It surely is not unreasonable for the Poles to repudiate gains made at their country's expense, and by methods of naked force, during the period of German-Soviet collaboration.

2. A very large number of people—the official Polish figure is about 1,500,000—were arbitrarily deported to Russia from the occupied regions of Poland and assigned to forced labor under conditions of hardship and inhumanity. Now that the Soviet Union and Poland have been allies for almost two years, it is certainly natural for the Poles to feel resentment at the detention of these unfortunate people—those of them who have survived the experience—in Russia and at the attempt to force Soviet citizenship upon them.

3. When the Soviet government broke off relations with the Polish government headed by General Sikorski there was a good deal of comment, both from Moscow and from other European capitals, to the effect that this move was designed to force a reorganization of the Polish government-in-exile. This sort of pressure was in the best, or the worst, tradition of the Empress Catherine II, whose continual interference in Polish internal affairs was the prelude to the final national tragedy of partition.

If the ideals of justice, freedom, and national self-determination to which all the United Nations are pledged are to be upheld, I think any Soviet-Polish settlement sponsored by Anglo-American diplomacy should embody the following three points: (1) no annexation by the Soviet Union of former Polish territory except after a free, unintimidated plebiscite under neutral international auspices, and, of course, without Red Army occupation; (2) freedom for the deportees from eastern Poland to choose Polish or Soviet citizenship, as they may desire, and freedom for those who choose the former to return to Poland as soon as circumstances permit; (3) scrupulous observance by the Soviet and Polish governments of the principle of non-interference in the internal affairs of the other country.

Race and the Draft

Dear Sirs: I have recently returned from Fort Huachuca, Arizona, where I served as Assistant Field Director, American Red Cross, with the 93rd Division, which is 100 per cent Negro. My experience there opened my eyes as never before to the conditions that exist among the Negroes, and I want to pass on to you a few of the facts that I learned while on duty with the Negro troops.

It is indisputable that the Southern draft boards have shown great prejudice in their selection of draftees. This statement was made to me by both white and colored officers. Out of a division of 15,000 to 18,000 men, approximately 2,000 are being discharged for physical disability. Many men obviously unfit for army service were inducted. During one period men were being discharged at the rate of 60 to 70 a day. I can understand how the local draft boards took these men, but I cannot understand how they passed the medical examination at army induction centers if these were conducted with any degree of honesty.

Hundreds of these misfits are being weeded out at Fort Huachuca. They are placed in casual companies, deprived of all extra clothing, mess-kits, and personal equipment, and have not been paid for months. Whether this is due to inefficiency or plan, I do not know. I do know that dozens of these poor devils came to our office asking for small comfort loans so they could purchase razor blades, toilet articles, and other necessities. I do not know whether similar conditions exist in other camps or not.

Other phases of the situation I cannot discuss because it would be revealing military information. It is unnecessary for me to write about the social conditions revealed to me by my case work with the Negro soldiers. All that is an old story to you. But the convictions I held when I came to Huachuca were deepened by my experience there, short as it was.

Morale work among the Negro troops is futile and absurd. Actually, these men have nothing to fight for; yet only one man of the hundreds I interviewed at Huachuca expressed his sense of injustice bitterly. He did so with tears in his eyes because he is a young husband and father who was drafted from Mississippi and is afraid that his house will be sold out from under him in his absence. This leads me to my last point, which is that a majority of the draftees at Huachuca seem to be married and many of them are fathers. Evidently it has been the practice of the Southern boards to draft married Negroes and family men before similar classes of whites were called.

The Shape of Things

THREE YEARS AGO THE FRENCH REPUBLIC was given up for dead. Seven months ago it was revived, albeit in ghastly caricature and on condition that it be governed by one of the men who had betrayed it. Six months ago, with the death of Darlan, an effort was made to establish in power a man who, while loyal to France, was hardly to be counted a champion of liberty. Today France once more has an army in the field, a capital at Algiers, and, if not a full-fledged government, at least a respected and self-respecting trustee of its traditions and its sovereignty. Thus the political nature of this war asserts itself despite all attempts to treat the struggle in strictly military terms. For this consummation, long and devoutly wished, one man is entitled to the plaudits of the democratic world—General Charles de Gaulle. Through three years of rebuffs, scarcely veiled hostility, and diplomatic scheming, he has held to his unalterable resolve to keep France fighting until the invader is ousted, the Republic restored, and the people given an opportunity to start afresh with a government of their own choosing. General Giraud has had on his side the bulk of the growing French army and the weight of Anglo-American diplomatic favor. De Gaulle has had on his side an unquenchable persistence—and the loyal support of the mass of the French people. This loyalty, discouraged by his political foes wherever possible and belittled by propaganda, has been magnificently demonstrated by the wave of joy and enthusiasm that attended his arrival in Algiers. The newly formed committee which will govern the French Empire until the liberation of France itself has a thorny path to follow, but its composition offers hope, and friends of France can only wish it well.

THAT LARGE WAX-SEALED ENVELOPE WHICH Joseph E. Davies is carrying home from Moscow may contain Premier Stalin's acceptance of an invitation to confer in person with President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill. If it does, the fact will confirm numerous indications that the Soviet Union's relations with its two major allies are at last rising from the level of cagey horse-trading to a plane of mutual trust and sincere collaboration. The President let it be known on three earlier occasions that he would welcome a session with Mr. Stalin, only to be turned down on the thin pretext that the Russian leader was too busy carrying on the war. The impression was left that Stalin wished to avoid a showdown on such questions as an immediate second front and disputed boundary claims at a time when his dependence on lend-lease aid made it unlikely that he could have the last word. If he is now prepared to confer with his allies it is probable that he has found reason to trust their good-will and judgment in the conduct of the war and to abandon his understandable fears of an anti-Soviet cordon sanitaire with the coming of the peace. The successful Washington mission of Anthony Eden, followed by that of President Benes of Czechoslovakia, both pro-Russian, the unprecedentedly warm reception to Davies, Moscow's enthusiastic celebration, with American participation, of the anniversary of the Anglo-Russian treaty, the Russian editorial tributes to American aid, the dissolution of the Comintern, and the increasing prospects of a Kremlin accord with the Vatican—all point to a post-war world in which Russia will be a respected status quo power, and no longer the Typhoid Mary among the nations.

THE JAPANESE DRIVE IN CENTRAL CHINA, which at one time appeared to offer a serious threat to Chungking, has been checked by a successful Chinese counter-offensive. With the support of American fliers, an enemy force of five divisions was routed near the eastern end of the Yangtze gorge, and it seems likely that the Japanese will be unable to hold their advance base at Ichang. Further south, where they have overrun the fertile lands bordering Tungting Lake, the situation remains obscure. This region is an important rice-growing area, and should the Japanese be able to retain their hold on it, Free China's already slim food supplies would be seriously diminished. But with the Chinese army plainly retaining its punching power, the invaders can hardly consolidate their position without strong reinforcements.

MR. ROOSEVELT'S NORMALLY ACUTE SENSE of public relations was certainly numbed on the day he decided to restrict press coverage of the United Nations conference on post-war food problems. It is, of course, nonsense to talk about the decision as if it were part of a sinister plot to destroy freedom of the press. In fact, it seems likely that the President's intent was to discourage the common practice at international conferences of using outside publicity as a means of exerting inside pressure—a practice facilitated by newspapermen whose intelligence and sense of responsibility is subordinated to a thirst for sensation. But whatever the motivation, the proposed ban was unwise and has not proved enforceable. Step by step the Administration has had to retreat, until the press has acquired nearly all the privileges it could reasonably ask. But while rejoicing at the victory of the press we must condemn the undignified way in which some newspapers sought to gully the conference. Claiming that they were unable to obtain any real news—a claim refuted by the excellent stories published elsewhere—their reporters burned up the wires with what Newsweek calls a "choice collection of trivia." This is a pretty cheap way of hitting back at the President and a poor service to the cause of freedom of the press, which, like other rights, is most easily undermined by abuse.

THIS DANGER IS WELL ILLUSTRATED BY THE facts which the Department of Justice has brought out in its anti-trust suit against the Associated Press. The main contention of the defendants is that any order forcing them to relinquish the restrictive covenants in their by-laws would constitute an abridgment of freedom of the press. A motion by the government asking for summary judgment in this case suggests strongly that the shoe is on the other foot, that the exclusive policy followed by the Associated Press has served to create local monopolies for its members and to hamper the growth of competing newspapers. There is no need here to recapitulate the facts developed by the government, since to a large extent the same ground was covered in two articles by Keith Hutchison in our issues of February 6 and 13. But it may be recalled that in the second of those articles the writer pointed out that if the exclusive membership contracts of the A. P. were upheld, other agencies might be compelled to give their clients similar protection from competition. The government's motion indicates that this situation has already arisen. "In either the morning or evening field, or both, in 144 cities," it declares, "a new subscriber may not receive the news services of the United Press Association unless it pays competitors already subscribing to U. P. services a substantial sum of money." The International News Service has similar contracts in force in 62 cities, and in 12 it has made exclusive contracts with newspapers. The result is that in a considerable number of places anyone wishing to start a newspaper would find himself unable to obtain the services of any of the three news agencies, without which no daily can hope to give its readers national and international coverage. Thus we see freedom of the press ceasing to be a general right and becoming a monopolized privilege.

"I CAME HERE," SAID THE BOLD SAILOR IN the House visitors' gallery, "to see how a democracy works and found them fighting the Civil War all over again." They took him to the guard room after his outburst before he could see that the North had won again. The passage of the Marcantonio Anti-Poll-Tax bill in the House last week by a vote of 265-110 is a great victory for democracy, the first to be registered in Congress in a long while. It was a victory for poor white as well as black and, if followed up, should help rid the whole country of the reactionary members sent to Congress by the poll-tax states. Proto-fascists from the North, like Hoffman of Michigan, joined Southern reactionaries in voting against the bill, while Northern Republicans like Baldwin of New York and Bender of Ohio helped lead the fight for repeal of the poll tax. A reading of the debate, and of the benighted ideas spewed up in it, is a revelation of the forces that lie in wait in this country should free government falter. Nazi Germany could hardly show more adherence to racial myths and anti-democratic conceptions than some members from our South. The best way to keep them out of the saddle is to help the masses of the South, white and black, vote them out. The next step is to fight for the bill's passage in the Senate, where lines are already forming to block it.

HENRY FORD USED TO REFER TO EDESEL AS "the boss," but the son was always overshadowed by the father. While he shared neither the old man's inventive genius nor his flair for publicity, he is supposed to have played an important part in the administration of the vast Ford domains. Those who knew him assert that Edsel was both more reasonable and broader in his sympathies than his father. He is credited with persuading Henry to abandon Model T, but he was not able to induce him to junk equally outdated labor policies. In that field the aging emperor has leaned heavily on his Minister of Interior and Chief of Police, Harry Bennett, who with the death of the Crown Prince is likely to become a still greater power behind the throne. In fact, he may eventually be the man to dicker with the bankers, whom Henry Ford has always hated and repelled, over the disposal of the empire. In Wall Street today its ramifications and its worth are being discussed expectantly. Ford finances have always been a closely guarded secret, but it is known that in December, 1941, the stock of the Ford Motor Company had a book value of $629,943,031. Since Edsel is believed to have owned about 40 per cent, estate and inheritance taxes, even if the real value is no greater than this figure, will amount to something like $187,000,000. The Fords are said to have accumulated large holdings of government bonds in anticipation of this liability, but as Henry is over eighty a further drain on the family resources must be anticipated. Possibly this situation will be met without turning the empire itself over to the bankers for sale to the public, but the question then arises whether Edsel's sons will be able or anxious to carry on the dynasty. Wall Street ponders these matters and waits, impersonal and deathless. It may yet have the last laugh at the defiant Henry.

Black Markets

THE black-market evil has assumed huge proportions in the United States. Officials no longer make an effort to conceal this unpalatable fact. Off the record they admit that at least 20 per cent of our meat is being sold through illegal channels. The actual proportion is probably much greater. Large black markets are also admitted to exist in butter, poultry, potatoes, and vegetables. In contrast to the situation in many other countries, and to the bootlegger era in the United States, these black markets are often difficult to recognize because they are not to be found in hole-in-the-wall shops in some dark alley but in the corner grocery, the neighborhood butcher shop, and the chain store that we have patronized for years. Probably in a majority of instances the housewife does not know when she is patronizing a black market.

But the evil is not less serious because it is so difficult to recognize. Unless held in check, these black markets can cause vital damage to the entire war effort. They are a direct threat to rationing and the whole principle of distributing the burden of war fairly. Because they are wasteful and unregulated, they can seriously curtail the total amount of food available for consumers. They have already severely dislocated the purchase of food supplies for the army and lend-lease. They are a threat to legitimate business and may seriously undermine the morale of the home front. They also cause a substantial loss in such strategic raw materials as hides, adrenalin, insulin, fertilizers, and bone meal, for the black market feeds on the big cuts of meat and throws away the rest.

While former bootleggers and underworld characters may be involved in some of these illegal operations, we shall not make much progress toward eliminating them if we regard the black market as merely the result of gangster activities. Nor is it safe to go to the other extreme and place the blame solely on faulty OPA regulations. Some black-market activity is almost inescapable wherever price-fixing and rationing exist. Every warring country in the world has its illegal market, and black bourses flourished in peace time in countries, such as Germany and Russia, where the distribution of food and consumer goods was strictly regulated.

The present widespread black-market operations in this country may be traced to three distinct causes. The first and most obvious is the failure of Congress to provide the OPA with adequate machinery for enforcing price ceilings and rationing. Cooperation by the local police and courts has been notable chiefly for its absence. In several flagrant cases in New York City, magistrates have released black-market operators with rebukes to the Mayor and the OPA for interfering with business. The second cause may be found in what is popularly regarded as OPA blundering in setting price ceilings below

"costs of production." In any administrative price system inequities are bound to appear. If ceilings are constantly adjusted to rising costs, a creeping inflation develops which threatens the entire stabilization program. If such adjustments are not made, supplies are lost to the black market. The President's recent hold-the-line price order represented a conscious choice between these two evils; it was a choice that increased the threat of black markets. The third and probably the most powerful factor making for the evasion of OPA price ceilings and rationing regulations is the failure of Congress to raise taxes sufficiently to mop up the fifty or sixty billion dollars' worth of excess buying power in the pockets of the American people. The existence of this huge reservoir of money at a moment when food and consumer goods are scarce creates a tremendous incentive to illegal dealings.

We may assume that a vast majority of the American people would like to rid themselves of this loathsome parasite that has fastened itself on legitimate business. But there is no clear understanding of what needs to be done. Since the causes are manifold, the attack on the black-market evil should be made simultaneously on several different fronts. Farmers and producers can help by refusing to sell except through legitimate channels, and by collecting ration stamps for all goods sold directly to retailers or consumers. They should report suspicious dealers or truckers to their local county war boards. Retailers can help by refusing to pay more than ceiling prices for products, even though this means disappointing their customers, and by insisting on getting and passing on the full quota of ration stamps for all meats and butter handled. They also should be on the watch for meat without a slaughter number and grade stamp. The chief burden of enforcement, however, rests on the consumers. As a group, and often as individuals, they have it in their power to minimize black-market dealings by carefully watching ceiling prices, by never asking a butcher or shopkeeper for goods without surrendering the proper number of ration points, by destroying all unused ration stamps, and by reporting all suspected violations to the local OPA office.

These are elementary duties of good citizenship. But it should not be supposed that their fulfillment alone will drive out the illegal markets. The other basic causes must be similarly attacked. The OPA must keep closer to market realities in establishing ceiling prices. Judicious use of subsidies will prove a far more effective weapon against illegal operations than fines and threats of jail sentences. It is even more important to attack the tax problem. Congress's action in remitting 75 per cent of the 1942 income tax has released a very considerable volume of excess buying power. A way must be found to reabsorb this and a large part of the remaining surplus if any substantial progress is to be made against the black market.

A Program of Inaction

BY FRED A. KIRCHWEY

THE weeks following the end of the Bermuda conference on refugee problems have brought nothing but a series of excuses for the failure of the British and American governments to do anything effective to rescue the victims of Hitler's terror who still remain alive. Indeed, the conference itself seems to have been devoted almost entirely to the formulation of those excuses: You couldn't ask favors of Hitler or of any of the governments under his domination. There wasn't any available transportation even in ships coming back from the war fronts in ballast. The extermination of the Jews seemed only too likely, but still, among all the would-be refugees of Europe, how could one single out the Jews for special treatment? Then, where would they go? England had taken more than its share, and so had the rest of the empire. Palestine's gates had been closed by a White Paper. The quota system in the United States was immutable. The conferees would therefore concentrate most of their effort on the immediate problem of transferring to temporary places of settlement refugees who have succeeded in reaching neutral countries. The Nazi victims in occupied Europe would have to wait for an Allied victory. Wait—above the earth or under it.

What little has happened in recent weeks confirms the negative impression made by the conference. A Parliamentary debate on the results of the Bermuda meeting brought statements from both Mr. Eden, the Foreign Secretary, and Osbert Peake, Under Secretary for the Home Office, agreeing that nothing much could be done for victims of fascist persecution until the war was won. At the same time the State Department announced that "a first contingent of refugees from a neutral country has been transferred to a temporary haven," but reiterated that "no negotiations with Hitler could be undertaken for the rescue of potential refugees from Nazi-occupied territory, since his entire record has left no doubt that he would only agree to such solutions as would be of direct aid to the Axis war aims."

The British and American governments are doubtless animated by both altruistic and interested motives in moving refugees from overcrowded neutral countries to settlements elsewhere, properly supervised and perhaps financed through some intergovernmental body. Such a project has the virtue of helping the refugees and at the same time relieving the pressure of unwelcome thousands on the gates of the United States and Britain—and Palestine. But the rescue of people who have already rescued themselves is at best a rather minor and tangential operation. The real job is a different one, and not all the alibis cooked up in a hundred conferences will justify its neglect.

We should examine the excuses formulated in Bermuda and decide for ourselves whether or not they are sufficient to justify inaction. Certainly it is unlikely that Hitler would yield to any pleas for the release of Jews now under his direct control. But since, in the past, he has been interested in getting rid of Jews and has not always insisted upon slaughtering them, it is barely possible that he might agree to an exodus from the ghettos of Poland arranged through neutral intermediaries. It is not likely, but it is possible.

But assuming Hitler refused to relinquish his prey, there is still a definite chance that some of the lesser Axis governments might agree to do so. Hungary, Bulgaria, Rumania might well choose to dispose of a troublesome problem and at the same time curry favor with the powers that now appear the probable winners. If these Axis satellites would release the Jews within their borders, many hundreds of thousands could be saved.

But how could these hordes be transported? And where could they go? If Britain would ease the restrictions on immigration into Palestine, refugees admitted there could travel overland. This most desired of all solutions has been flatly refused. Not even to save lives will Britain go beyond the quotas established in 1939. Palestine ruled out, it still might be possible to establish settlements, temporary at least, in other parts of the Near and Middle East and in North Africa. Ships carrying war supplies to the Mediterranean could bring refugees back to Britain or the United States.

But this suggestion collides with one of the chief obstacles to a solution—the reluctance of Britain and the United States to admit more refugees. Britain has been far more generous in this matter than we have. The United States has multiplied the complications involved in getting a visa to such a degree that only a fraction of the existing quotas from Nazi-occupied countries are being filled. Without changing the law in any particular we could take in more than 140,000 refugees immediately. And today they could be used to help overcome our growing shortage of industrial man-power.

As for the difficulty, stressed both here and in London, of singling out the Jews for rescue and ignoring the 120,000,000 people who, according to Mr. Peake, would escape from enemy-occupied territories if they could, this is one of those stumbling-blocks set up to serve as an excuse for inaction. Whole populations neither can nor want to escape, however much they may hate the tyrant. The Jews alone represent a group detached by force from their homes and occupations, segregated physically as well as socially, marked as a whole for annihilation. It is disingenuous to pretend that because the entire population of occupied Europe cannot be evacuated, no effort should be made to save any special group.

The difficulties raised at the Bermuda conference are real. But they afford no valid excuse for a policy of sitting back and doing nothing. The process of extermination may be complete long before victory is won. The only hope lies in acting now. A determined effort should be made to carry out at least a limited program of rescue. Even the attempt would bring hope and comfort to the desperate millions marked for slaughter.

Open Letter to Winston Churchill

DEAR SIR: May I, with all respect, address you briefly on the subject of India?

You, Lord Halifax, and Mr. Amery have stated publicly that the British government's proposal carried to India by Sir Stafford Cripps in March, 1942, still stands. Now all Indian parties, including the Congress Party, the Moslem League, and the Hindu Mahasabha, rejected the Cripps offer. When you say that an offer stands after all parties to whom it was made have rejected it, does not that mean that you propose to do nothing about a settlement in India?

You could reply that the Indian parties may have changed their minds. Then should you not ask them? More than a year has passed since the Cripps offer was rejected. Perhaps the parties have changed their minds. Why not find out?

Gandhi, Nehru, and the other leaders of the Congress Party, to be sure, are in jail. I, of course, would like to see them released, especially after Sir Maurice Gwyer, the British Chief Justice of India, ruled that they had been illegally arrested. But if Britain insists on their continued imprisonment, the Congress Working Committee could be consulted in jail. Why not do that? The British government has negotiated with imprisoned Indian leaders in the past.

I have one more question. All your public utterances, Sir, are heard and read with much interest by countless Americans. The American public was greatly impressed with your declaration in London, on November 10, 1942, "We mean to hold our own." You added, "I have not become the King's First Minister in order to preside at the liquidation of the British Empire." If the British continue to hold India, the empire will not be liquidated. But if you go on holding India, how can India become independent? Is there not a sharp contradiction between the Cripps offer of independence to India and your subsequent statement that you propose to hold India? This discrepancy might incline some persons to conclude that your government did not intend the Cripps offer to lead to Indian independence.

Very sincerely yours,

LOUIS FISCHER

THE oddest thing about the new Office of War Mobilization is that it is to be headed by the man who has been doing his best to keep Congress from passing the Pepper-Kilgore-Tolan bill for—an Office of War Mobilization. It was James F. Byrnes who, last February, organized Republicans and anti-New Deal Democrats to take the bill from the Senate Labor and Education Committee, which was friendly to it, and inter it in the hostile Senate Military Affairs Committee.

The bill was transferred to the Military Affairs Committee in the hope of killing it, and the debate, which took place on February 4, was a bitter one. The vote was thirty-nine to twenty-eight, and the line-up was significant. For in it, as in the "beat Japan first" debate, one found the military bureaucracy lined up with reactionaries, America Firsters, and worse, against the New Dealers in the Senate. The unspeakable Reynolds, who is still chairman of the Senate Military Affairs Committee, "Happy" Chandler, Tydings, Wheeler, Walsh, Byrd, and Clark of Missouri were among those who fought to take the bill from the progressive Labor and Education Committee.

The Administration, through its Senate leader, Barkley, and its "assistant President," Byrnes, was in the position of fighting those men who have been most loyal to the New Deal—Pepper, Thomas of Utah, Truman, Kilgore, Bone, Murray, La Follette, and Ellender. With the progressives in their fight to save the bill were not only such liberal Republicans as Brewster but others as far right as Taft and Vandenberg. Lodge of Massachusetts later told a closed session of the Senate Military Affairs Committee that certain high army and navy officials asked him to help transfer the bill to that committee so it could be kept from a vote on the floor. Afterward, Thomas of Utah was explosive in his comment.

That executive session and its revelations added to the protest and disgust among the New Dealers. Thomas, as true and devoted a progressive as the American people have in Washington, is not only chairman of the Labor and Education Committee but ranking member of the Military Affairs Committee. His anger bore fruit in the appointment of Kilgore to head the subcommittee in charge of the bill, and the composition of this subcommittee was such as to defeat the purpose of the transfer. The Kilgore subcommittee on May 12 turned in as favorable a report on the bill as could have been expected from the Labor and Education Committee. It declared the establishment of an Office of War Mobilization with a War Mobilization Board "urgently necessary" if we were to meet our production goals this year. This report, coming after the unseemly and inconclusive dispute between Rubber Director Jeffers and Under Secretary of War Patterson over the rubber and aviation-gas programs, led publications as conservative as the New York Times to join the committee in suggesting the creation of "some central all-powerful agency . . . to do away with conflicts incompatible with total war."

In the Senate itself the revised "Pepper-Kilgore-Tolan" bill won the sponsorship of a powerful bipartisan bloc made up of Pepper, Murray, Ball, Capper, Green, Johnson of Colorado, La Follette, and Thomas of Utah. The hearings and debates on the Maloney bill for a separate civilian-supply agency helped the drive for a new and more comprehensive set-up by dramatizing the weaknesses of the old in a crucial sector of our war economy. The War and Navy departments, ever jealous of civilian encroachment and ever unwilling to see their activities meshed with other war agencies, began to feel that only desperate remedies could prevent passage of the bill. The strategy decided upon seems to have been the establishment by executive decree of an agency which would bear the same name—the Office of War Mobilization—as that desired by Congress but would be so set up and manned as to leave the military-naval bureaucracy to go on pretty much as before.

The logical army-navy candidate for the job of running that agency was Byrnes. His conception of how to run the war effort is not so much through organization and planning as through the process of "umpiring" recurrent disputes between uncoordinated agencies. The Truman, Tolan, Pepper, and Kilgore committees have amply demonstrated the weakness of this approach in their various reports, but it suits the purposes of the War and Navy departments, which like that form of organization best which interferes with them least. Unfortunately, a total effort cannot be obtained in this way, for a total effort requires the careful balancing of all factors—man-power, production, rationing, wages, prices—which enter into the efficient operation of a war economy.

It is too early to judge the efficacy of the new Office of War Mobilization, but its political genealogy, as mapped here, makes one dubious. Doubt turns to dissatisfaction when one comes to consider the executive order setting up the new office. For this order, while broad, is also vague, and contains a number of loopholes. The War Mobilization Committee, which will run the "Office," is to consist of Byrnes, Stimson, Knox, Hopkins, and Judge Fred M. Vinson, the new Director of Economic Stabilization. Vinson is as conservative in outlook as his fellow Southern Democrat, Byrnes. Hopkins has from the beginning of his ascendancy in the Administration been an advocate of "appeasing" business, and most business men, like most of the procurement officers in the War and Navy departments, prefer a form of supervision which interferes as little as possible with the customary ways of placing contracts and doing business. Needless to say, these "customary practices and relationships" of a peace-time economy, as the recent Kilgore report pointed out, are not the way to get an all-out effort in war.

The make-up of the committee, as well as the vague executive order, points in the direction of an "umpiring" and consultative body, and though this is indeed a step in advance of the present system, it is not enough in advance to meet our needs. The executive order fails to gear several production factors directly into the new committee. Man-power is not represented at the top, and prices, wages, and food seem to be left autonomous.

Congress can best serve the nation's interests by passing the Kilgore-Pepper-Tolan bill as originally planned. A large vote for it will at least serve to push this new agency farther toward the kind of coordinated and planned program we need. Now, as in the past, the tendency—though with not a few honorable exceptions—both of the business men in army-navy procurement uniforms and of those on the dollar-a-year pay roll is to reduce our production goals rather than make the extraordinary efforts necessary to attain them. They would rather produce less than disturb their ordinary commercial practices and relationships. Under cover of the ballyhoo headlines our production goals have constantly been revised downward in response to this undertow of lethargy. This year's goal, originally set for $75,000,000,000, has been reduced to $63,000,000,000 and will be reduced farther if we can get nothing better than this phony Office of War Mobilization. The fight for a centrally directed war effort is a fight to save lives and shorten the war. This clever maneuver must not bring that struggle to an end.

Sweden and the Russian Bogy

BY BLAIR BOLLES

Stockholm, May 25, by Cable

A SENSATION was caused in the Grand Hotel here a few days ago when I walked through the lobby carrying a Russian flag. It was to decorate the table where English journalists were dining with their Soviet colleagues. The sight of the gold hammer and sickle on a red field made many nervous hearts beat faster, for the Swedes suffer from the Russian-bogyman complex. The dissolution of the Comintern has soothed them, but anxiety about Russia is due not only to bolshevism but to historic hatreds and to nightmare fears that Russia wants a piece of Swedish territory for a through route to Narvik. The Swedes shuddered almost as violently at the Czar's double-eagle standard in the old days as they react now to the red ensign. The prospect that Finland will be conquered and that Sweden will again have Russia for a next-door neighbor is an uncomfortable one.

The struggle toward a decision whether to try to get along with Russia or to follow a course based on mistrust of it affects all classes and all activities, even in the midst of war. Swedish peasant mothers frighten their babies with stories about bad "Ryskies," and even liberal thinkers, like Bertil Ohlin, the well-known economist of Stockholm University, favor the maintenance of a strong post-war army to protect the country from the unpredictable bear to the east. The government, however, has embarked on a policy of forming close commercial ties with Russia. This policy was implemented by a trade treaty in 1941, and further developments are expected after the war. Cautious Christian Günther, the Foreign Minister whose negotiations to keep Sweden out of war have led some to accuse him of being friendly to Germany, holds that Swedish fear of Russia has no solid basis.

The government's pro-Russian policy has been carried out under Per Albin Hansson, Social Democrat and Premier of a coalition government since 1939. A strange opposition to him has developed in the Kooperativa Förbundet, the great Swedish consumers' wholesale buying organization, which suspects he wishes to introduce state capitalism on the Russian model. The government is now operating rayon and match factories in competition with private enterprise; it owns copper mines; and it has nationalized most of the railroads. The Kooperativa's president, Albin Johansson, complains that private industry does not oppose the trend toward state capitalism with sufficient vigor, and, indeed, it is a queer feature of Swedish opinion today that private industry is the chief friend of the Hansson-Günther Russian policy. Einer Magnusson, sales manager of the Sandvik Steel Works, which makes fine steel for Swiss watch springs and for razor blades, told me that he expects Russia to become a great market for Swedish goods when the war is over. The 1941 trade agreement between Russia and Sweden provides for Swedish sales amounting to 200,000,000 kronor annually. The bourgeois Mr. Magnusson, who has made sixteen trips to Moscow, sees Russia as a potential sellers' paradise. He thinks, too, that there will be opportunities to internationalize industry by licensing Swedish patents for Russian use.

War-time industrial expansion, which has boomed the business of such world-famous concerns as SKF and Bofors, threatens to burden Sweden with an unbalanced economy after the war and with great unemployment unless extensive markets can be found to absorb the materials now used at home. In order to survive in this fortress continent, Sweden has had to become almost self-sustaining. It questions whether after the war Britain will buy such large quantities of goods as formerly, and it fears that a reconstructed Germany will be a minor market, although the pre-war Reich was Sweden's best customer. So the hopes of Swedish business men rest on Russia, which is already, by devious channels, receiving goods from the Sandviken and other factories. Sandviken maintains a trader's neutrality, selling to both Germany and the Allies, and it recently opened a factory in Milan.

Although a near neighbor of Russia, Sweden bought little from it in the past. Now the Swedes look forward to obtaining Russian hides, oil, and other raw materials. Popular education in regard to Russia is needed, however, to improve relations; a hopeful travel magazine, Fritiden, features in its current number a sixteen-page article on the Trans-Siberian Railway. Swedes are quick to point out places where Russian marauders struck at their coasts time after time more than a century ago, forgetting that Charles XII of Sweden overran Russia.

One reason for the prosperous state of Sweden's war-time industry is the astounding technological ingenuity that has flowered here while the country has been an oasis of peace in a warring continent. The Swedes have learned to make the most of their raw materials, especially of their forests. Much of the country is covered by a blanket of pine, spruce, birch, and oak, and the wood is proving its salvation in these hard days. Sweden used to import much of the feed for its cows. When war cut off supplies, Swedish cellulose manufacturers found nutritive elements in wood pulp, and now cattle are fed shredded cellulose enriched with phosphate and magnesium salts and made tasty with molasses. Wood also provides fuel for Sweden's automobiles, which get eighty miles from one sack of charcoal dumped into the gas-making machines they carry behind them. Sweden's iron foundries too now run on charcoal, since supplies of coal, obtainable only from Germany, have been cut in half. Tar from forest stumps is the basis of lubricating oil, which can no longer be obtained in adequate quantities from abroad. Swedish turpentine is in great demand because it can be used as a flotation oil in the refining of copper ores. Formerly American pine oil exclusively was used for this purpose.

Before the war Sweden produced 9,000 tons of copper annually; now it is producing 18,000. Huge mines have been opened in the mountains of the far north along the banks of the Skellefteo River, where at Boliden and Kristenberg the traveler finds a new frontier slowly developing. The Boliden mine produces copper, gold, zinc, and more arsenic than any other mine in the world. The problem is to discover new uses for this dangerous poison, which at present is being stored unrefined. Boliden chemists since the war started have developed a non-poisonous zinc-arsenic spray for fruit trees which is being used in many Swedish orchards, especially the great Ramlosa plantation in the south. After the war the Boliden company hopes to sell to the world its wood-preserving arsenic salt, with which it believes it can make timber termite-proof. The Forest Products Laboratory in Madison, Wisconsin, is now testing this claim.

Neutrality has been the mother of Swedish invention. Isolation has stimulated manufacturers, but industry will retain its fat only if Sweden can again become an international trader when the fighting ends. Occasionally Swedes ask themselves: Will countries which have fought through hell welcome economic cooperation with a land which managed to avoid battle? The Swedes are predominantly pro-Ally, but officials give no sign that they understand the implications of the struggle going on around them. "A war of the great powers," Christian Günther calls it.

The majority of the Swedes I have talked to during my three weeks in Stockholm and on my travels up and down the country have been complacent about neutrality, and outspoken enemies of Nazism like Torgny Segerstedt, an eminent Gothenburg editor, and Carl Gerhard, the Stockholm producer of "Arsenic and Old Lace," are apparently crying in the wilderness. Still, many Swedes are ashamed that the government permits trains carrying Nazi soldiers and arms to travel across Sweden from Germany to Norway and from Finland to Norway. This transit agreement was made in the summer of 1940, and the people discovered it only accidentally, after the traffic began. At that time, Swedish soldiers, not having been informed about this concession to Germany, met a Nazi troop train with hand grenades.

During thirty years of political activity Premier Hansson has done much to improve the lot of the industrial workers, for whom he has devised a sort of Beveridge plan, although the miserable state of thousands of lumbermen has been largely ignored. Now, however, he is old and not susceptible to new ideas. One reason for Socialist support of economic ties with Russia is that an anti-Russian policy would entail the maintenance of a large standing army, the cost of which would reduce social-welfare services.

Isolation from the west is forcing Sweden to carry on a disproportionately heavy trade with Germany, which now takes 40 per cent of Swedish exports compared with 19½ per cent in 1939. Four years ago Sweden exported one-third of all its production; now it can sell abroad only one-eighth. Germany's share of that eighth provides the exchange for the coal and coke which the Swedish arms industry needs in order to prepare the country against a possible German invasion. The outlay for arms is now about one billion kronor—$250,000,000—a year, but the government has still been able to increase expenditures on social welfare from 314,181,200 kronor in 1939-40 to 459,160,000 kronor in the present year. Small farmers, formerly inarticulate and largely excluded from the well-advertised utopian aspects of Swedish life, are now organizing to get greater benefits from an open-handed government.

Economic Basis for the Peace

BY MAXWELL S. STEWART

MOST Americans are prepared to help put Europe and Asia on their feet again after the war. But they think of the task as a short-time job and are frankly fearful lest our aid make it possible for European or Asiatic industry to undercut our own in the world markets. In other words, we are prepared to be altruistic, but we don't want to overdo it. Many persons still regard talk of helping other countries as misguided idealism when we have great problems to solve at home.

Actually, of course, it is common sense of the most hard-headed variety. Unless some degree of economic security can be restored throughout the world, plans to prevent World War III are only so much wishful thinking. No political formula can hope to succeed in a world plagued with poverty, unemployment, and business uncertainty. The experience of the 1930's is unmistakable on this point. It was no accident that the Japanese invasion of Manchuria, which marked the beginning of the breakdown of the world's peace machinery, came on the same day that Great Britain abandoned the gold standard. Nor did there just happen to be six million unemployed in Germany when Hitler seized power early in 1933. All these events stemmed from a common cause—the Great Depression. If we are to have any hope of outlawing aggression and building a firm international organization, we must first tackle the economic problem, and tackle it in world terms.

Hard-headed realism makes it clear also that there can be no hope for permanent prosperity in the United States while the rest of the world suffers from economic stringency. This became increasingly evident as we floundered through one domestic panacea after another during the whole of the past decade. And it is particularly true today. During the war this country has built up its steel and machine industries to far greater capacity than is justified by our own peace-time requirements. These industries can be kept busy only if they help in the reconstruction of Europe and the development of the world's backward areas. American industry and American agriculture as a whole are more dependent on foreign markets today than at any other time in our history. Thus we have everything to gain by raising the buying power of foreign peoples and everything to lose by a relapse into economic isolationism. Furthermore, a revival of financial health is dependent on the finding of new outlets for long-term investment.

Only a bold program, and a realistic one, can hope to succeed. For years every international conference has agreed on vague generalities. Dozens of pious statements have been drawn up in the past quarter-century stressing the need for (1) stabilization of currencies, (2) reduction of trade barriers, and (3) the establishment of international lending on a firm basis. But nothing has ever happened. And the reason nothing has happened is that the program has been essentially a backward-looking one. It has aimed to restore the pre-1914 world. A realistic post-war economic program will not ignore currencies, trade, or foreign loans. But it will forget 1914 and try to meet the grave problems that will beset us at the end of this war. Instead of seeking to restore a completely self-regulating, gold-standard economy, it will accept the fact that business is subject to controls in every country and provide ways of adjusting these controls in the interest of world prosperity.

Let us assume that for purely selfish reasons we want to raise living standards and increase purchasing power throughout the world. We want to enlarge the market for, say, Ford automobiles and Hollywood moving pictures. What steps should we take?

INTERNATIONAL PWA

It should be fairly clear that the devastated areas of Europe and Asia will have to be restored to full productive efficiency before the people living in them can buy much abroad. This is a long-range job and is not to be confused with the task of rehabilitation. Years will be required merely to replace the homes destroyed by bombing and shell fire. The rebuilding of factories, warehouses, and commercial properties may take even longer. Furthermore, much new construction will be necessary before economic life in the war-torn areas can be put on a firm basis. The European transportation system, for example, needs a thorough overhauling. Many parts of Europe are without even the roads needed for local trade. The railway and canal system needs to be extended in many areas. If this is true of modern Europe, what of Asia? Even today the greater part of China and much of India is without roads of any description, to say nothing of railroads. In 1941 China had only 70,000 miles of motor highways and about 6,000 miles of railroads. This was one-eighth of the highway mileage and one-fortieth of the railroad mileage of the United States, which has a population less than one-third as large as China's.

Careful consideration must be given to the organization of these reconstruction projects. After the last war American bankers lent the needed capital to European governments or private firms, and this country had little to say about what was done with it. Apart from the fact that Germany used at least a portion of this money to rearm, the whole arrangement worked badly. Far too much money was lent to some countries—chiefly Germany—and too little to others. Some of it was used for constructive purposes; much was not. A great deal of the capital advanced by this country never got farther than the pockets of promoters—on both sides of the Atlantic.

To prevent this kind of international wildcatting—as disastrous on a world scale as in a local land boom—there will have to be a large measure of international supervision. This could be assured if the reconstruction program were carried out as a joint international public-works project. The labor can, and in most instances should, be provided by the country in which the work is being done. But much of the capital, equipment, and technical supervision, at least in the countries most devastated by the war, might be provided through an international agency.

The arguments for international public works as a post-war reconstruction measure are similar to, but stronger than, those for a domestic public-works program. The amount of construction needed in the devastated areas is infinitely greater than our domestic post-war requirements, while the amount of domestic capital available for the task is much smaller. Because of the disorganization of the Continent's normal economic life and the forced demobilization of Europe's huge armies, the number of jobless in need of assistance will undoubtedly be much greater than in the United States. International action is essential because many of the needed reconstruction projects cut across national boundaries. If the railway and highway construction is to be determined by the normal geographic flow of trade rather than by military considerations, for example, it must be planned and supervised by an international agency. Sanitary and health projects designed to aid in disease control should also be coordinated by an international planning board.

Furthermore, from a purely economic point of view, international public-works projects are better designed to provide purchasing power than national projects. They can and should be planned to aid the most poverty-stricken sections of Europe's and Asia's populations, thus raising purchasing power among the groups where the need for goods is greatest and the possibilities of self-help are least. These are the regions best calculated to furnish the new markets and new opportunities for investment for which industry and finance have been searching since 1929.

During the war international public works have been an everyday reality. American engineers, with American and British labor, built the big American land and sea bases in Northern Ireland. American money, American equipment, and American engineers, using Russian and Persian labor, have created a vast supply base on the Persian Gulf through which American lend-lease supplies are shipped to the Soviet Union. Similar miracles of international cooperation have occurred in Australia, North Africa, Liberia, and the British West Indies—wherever the United States has built bases during this war. In North Africa the French, British, and Americans participated in the economic arrangements essential to military operations.

Although these arrangements could hardly serve as models for peace-time cooperation, the experience thus gained should not be overlooked in planning for the post-war period. Lend-lease, for example, has been strikingly successful as a war-time device for pooling financial responsibility among the United Nations in accordance with their capacity. The lend-lease machinery should be kept for a while after the end of hostilities—at least until a permanent international financial organization can be set up.

WORLD ECONOMIC ORGANIZATION

But a world economic organization of some sort is clearly going to be needed if we are really to tackle the problem of raising purchasing power and living standards on a world scale after the war. And the groundwork for that organization should be laid now. This is not such a difficult task as it may seem. The world has already successfully organized international activities of the same type on a smaller scale. The International Labor Organization and the Health and Financial Sections of the League enjoyed far more success than the League's political branches.

All sorts of schemes have been proposed for a post-war economic organization that would build on this experience. For the most part, the details are unimportant, but certain principles must constantly be kept in mind. If the organization is to succeed, it must undercut the kind of economic rivalries that brought chaos in the 1930's. Political world organization can come only when a basis of common economic interest has been established. For this reason we might begin with a plan for international supervision of such activities as are clearly of universal concern. Much of the world's rail, ship, and air transportation cuts across national lines. In the interest of efficiency such transportation ought to be placed under the supervision of an international board. We already have a high degree of cooperation among the postal services of the various nations. Why not establish one unified world postal service? More complete cooperation is clearly called for in public-health work; disease germs do not recognize national boundaries.

The world economic organization must itself be free from nationalistic pressures. This will not be hard to achieve so far as the permanent staff is concerned; the staffs of the various League agencies were, on the whole, capable and free from national bias. The problem is more serious, however, in the policy-making agencies, where there is always danger of domination by the great powers. Nationalistic pressures might be reduced if the world economic organization were made up, as was the I. L. O., of representatives not only of governments but of such groups as farmers, consumers, employers, and workers.

The responsibilities of a world economic organization would necessarily resolve themselves into the familiar tasks of currency stabilization, elimination of trade barriers, and encouragement of international lending. To accomplish these purposes, three separate agencies may be called for: (1) a Central Bank, which would have the authority to fix and maintain exchange rates between the various currencies; (2) a Trade Commission, whose duty it would be to obtain the removal of existing restrictions on international trade; (3) a Development Commission, having at its disposal funds for financing public works.

The first hint that the United Nations governments were working in this direction came early in April when both London and Washington announced plans looking toward the stabilization of world currencies. Although similar, the two suggestions have important points of difference. The British plan, prepared by J. M. Keynes, calls for a world bank or international clearing union. Control over this international agency would rest with a board of directors of from twelve to fifteen members drawn from the participating countries. This board, rather than the governments, would be responsible for fixing the value of the "bancor" (the international monetary unit) in gold and for establishing the value of each currency. It would, however, act under clearly defined rules. If a country became too heavily in debt to the international agency, the directors might require that it surrender gold, reduce its foreign investments, or cut the value of its currency. Moreover, the governing board might have the right to recommend domestic measures that would help restore a balance in the country's international transactions.

Perhaps the most significant part of the Keynes scheme is its provision of funds that might be made available for international public-works schemes. A country having a "favorable" balance of payments—such as the United States has enjoyed since World War I—would accumulate a credit balance with the international fund. These balances could be lent out by the governing board much as a bank now lends the money that is deposited with it. This would prevent credit balances from being frozen, as they have been in the past, in gold bars buried at Fort Knox.

The White plan, outlined by Secretary Morgenthau before two Senate committees on April 5, is somewhat less flexible than the Keynes plan. It provides for the setting up of an International Stabilization Fund of the United and Associated Nations of approximately $5 billion. Each country is to contribute to the stabilization fund an amount based on such factors as its holdings of gold and foreign currency, fluctuations in its balance of international payments, and its national income. The system of control is similar to that outlined by Keynes. There would be a board of directors made up of representatives from each of the participating countries. The directors would have the power, by a four-fifths vote, to determine the value of any national currency. Although they could not force governments to remove trade barriers and other nationalistic measures, they might bring pressure on an offending country, and they would have the right to prevent the adoption of new exchange restrictions of all kinds.

Although there are many differences between the two plans, they are so similar in their broad outlines that a compromise should not be difficult to contrive. Both would probably work equally well in eliminating cut-throat currency wars such as occurred at the beginning of the great depression. Either might help to flatten out the ups and downs of the business cycle. But the Keynes plan is more adjustable and more comprehensive. It is not wedded to gold and might well be operated without gold. It provides a more direct and effective control over credit than the White plan. In giving his international agency the right of investment, Keynes has greatly strengthened its powers and opened a way for financing international public works; the control of credit as well as of exchange rates should enable the fund to check depressions before they get well started. Arrangements might even be made to use the international fund as an instrument in preventing aggression. On the recommendation of an international court or executive agency, the directors of the international fund might hold up the account of an aggressor and provide immediate financial aid to any country threatened with attack.

FREE TRADE AND TRADE CONTROLS

The outlines of possible United Nations efforts to stimulate trade after the war are less clear. The need for reducing tariffs has been stressed at the food conference. So far, no decision has been reached between the two basically different approaches to post-war trade policy represented by Secretary Hull on the one hand and Vice-President Wallace on the other. Hull has long been an outstanding exponent of free trade, while Wallace envisions a system of post-war trade controls. The choice is the more difficult because the sincerity and good-will of both men are beyond question. Mr. Hull has literally given his life to the struggle against trade barriers. But it is clear that a realistic program calls for something beyond his reciprocal-trade agreements, valuable as they have been.

From an international point of view, the success of the reciprocal-trade policy assumes an equality of bargaining power between the countries entering into agreements. In practice, such equality rarely exists. In most of the agreements between the United States and smaller nations this country has exacted greater concessions than it has granted in return. As a creditor with a favorable balance of payments, it should have—if it expected to be repaid—made greater concessions than the debtor countries. The psychology of bargaining is all wrong for this purpose. It is doubtful whether any basic improvement in trade policy can be brought about by bargaining separately with each country. There is a better chance of obtaining general post-war economic disarmament by international agreement at the peace conference.

If Hull's reciprocal program is likely to be ineffective in the face of the harsh realities of world trade policies, Wallace's dream of trade that is regulated in the interest of the common man has its dangerous aspects. Export quotas, fixed prices, and other types of trade control are ill adapted to the requirements of a cooperative international society. The existing instruments of control are all clearly recognized weapons of economic warfare. If they are retained, they will almost certainly be used to stir up strife between nations.

But above all we must avoid a return to the economic world of 1914. Seen in retrospect, that world looks much better than it actually was. Although it is true that the gold standard of that day acted as a sort of economic stabilizer, and thus kept depressions from becoming as acute as the crisis of 1929, the position of the debtor countries was far from enviable. Economic stability was maintained because bankruptcy, unemployment, privation, and hunger were accepted as inherent in the normal manner of readjustment. That view has been rejected everywhere today. A measure of control over economic life has become imperative. But unless the disastrous consequences of nationalistic ambitions during the past twenty-five years are to be repeated, a way must be found to bring such control under international supervision.

75 Years Ago in "The Nation"

THE GREAT EVENT of the week in Paris has been M. Thiers's speech on the treaty of commerce with England. M. Thiers is an intense protectionist, but his advocacy of the cause is marred by total ignorance of, and in fact great contempt for, political economy and political economists. Indeed, he makes a boast of not studying the works of these gentlemen.—June 4, 1868.

ON WEDNESDAY WEEK . . . there was debate in the Senate over the name for the new territory. Territories often keep their names when they become states, so we may be glad that "Cheyenne," to be pronounced "Shy-en," was not adopted. "Lincoln" was rejected for an obvious and, no doubt, sound reason. Apparently, nobody had a better name to offer, though there must be plenty of Indian words that could properly be used, and, for the present, the insignificant "Wyoming" is retained.—June 11, 1868.

THE RAILROAD CORPORATIONS are already of immense power. They own New Jersey, and . . . we cannot tell till next October whether Mr. Drew and Mr. Vanderbilt have not entered into an alliance which puts for many important purposes the whole State of New York into their hands.—June 25, 1868.

THE CALIFORNIAN LEGISLATURE . . . have been conveying large tracts of the [Yosemite] valley to two squatters, whose cuttings and diggings and taverns and liquors would utterly deface it, and convert it into a repulsive resort of tipplers. . . . The bill has been vetoed by the Governor and passed over his head, and now only waits the confirmation of Congress to take effect; but this, we trust, it will never receive.—June 25, 1868.

How Our Enemies Fight

III. GERMANY: BLITZKRIEG AND BLUNDER

BY GORDON COOPER

THE strategic advantages of the central geographic position occupied by eighteenth-century Prussia were brilliantly exploited by Frederick II during the Seven Years' War. In much the same manner that Hitler overran Poland, he launched a surprise offensive against Saxony, overwhelming it in a few weeks. Confronted then by the greatest coalition that had ever been formed in Europe, consisting of France, Austria, Russia, Sweden, and many of the smaller German states, Frederick used his central position to attack his opponents one after the other in a successful effort to keep them from combining to crush him.

At the outbreak of the present war the High Command of the Third Reich enjoyed the same advantages of a central position and interior lines of communication. But the experiences of the First World War had shown that the enormous armies of the twentieth century had acquired an increased power of defense which prevented such quick decisions in battle as were achieved by Frederick. In 1917, for instance, a concentration of some seventy divisions, or about 1,200,000 men, was considered necessary to achieve a single penetration over a twenty-five-mile sector. Memories of the enormous losses haunted both victor and vanquished after the war. Verdun and Passchendaele became symbols of the superiority of the defensive.

In many countries the case was considered proved. Acceptance of such a conclusion by Germany, however, would have meant military extinction, for successful operations from a central position require that the initiative be kept by a series of offensive actions. Another fundamental principle is that such offensive actions should be undertaken in only one direction at a time, thus allowing an overwhelming concentration to be brought to bear against a detail of the opponents' forces. If the Germans could not secure a quick decision in their offensives, they would be unable to swing their concentrated power along the radii of their interior position and fall on each of their opponents in turn. Another two-front war would result, and 1918 would be repeated. The only hope of avoiding such an outcome was to evolve a tactical system that would again obtain rapid decisions.

The methods of Blitzkrieg, the German solution of the problem, are too well known to need recapitulation here. By adapting its tactical system to the internal-combustion engine, the German army visualized the possibility of repeating the decisive battles of Frederick's day. It would not have to move from tactical objective to tactical objective as in the last war. It would be able to strike directly at strategic objectives and be fairly sure of an early decision.

After studying the results of von Faupel's experiments in Spain the High Command laid its plans. It fixed in advance the point where the final European decision was to be reached and mapped the successive steps according to the best principles of strategy.

At the opening of the war the defensive force was massed behind the Westwall, a hastily conceived barrier whose strength has never been tested. The offensive force—the spearhead of Germany's striking power, comprising only seventy divisions—was hurled against Poland, and in sixteen days the Polish army was annihilated. Blitzkrieg had staged here its opening performance, but it had played to a nearly empty house. For psychological reasons the Germans did their utmost by means of cinema and press to call attention to their masterpiece. But their future victims were determined not to understand.

As the battle of the Lowlands and France began, a holding force was left in the east and the offensive spearhead turned west. Now Blitzkrieg in all its power burst upon the Western consciousness. At Eben Emael, Sedan, Dunkirk, and the Somme "the greatest army in the world" was crushed. The Stukas, the tanks, and the mobile 88's were all used with demoralizing effect. France recoiled from the mobility and fire-power of the German tactics, which proceeded from strategic success to decision. No further time or effort was wasted in occupying the whole of France. Having made sure of its western flank, though failing in a limited offensive against Britain, the German army turned east again.

The spring of 1941 would seem to have been the period of greatest theoretical danger for the Reich, for it had to contain two powerful nations, Britain and Russia, while it secured its Balkan flank. Britain, however, was being paralyzed by night bombing and submarine attacks, and Russia was immobilized in mud. Once again the triumph of mobility over terrain was illustrated in sharp outline. The Serbs, who had held out for months in World War I, were conquered in three weeks. By June the Germans could feel secure enough on all sides to wheel against their main enemy.

The campaigns in Flanders and France have been estimated to have engaged actually only seventy-six German divisions out of a total of over three hundred. Consider the contrast with 1918, when seventy divisions were regarded as necessary for a limited offensive on a twenty-five-mile sector; the economy of force achieved in the crushing of France can then be fully appreciated. No more strength was assigned to the task than was necessary, and until the attack on Russia the German army never employed more than a quarter of its strength in one operation. As for the other principles of strategy discussed in my first article, in these "preliminary" campaigns the Germans adhered faithfully to them also and thereby achieved their strategic success.

The Russian campaign, which was to be the crowning glory of German arms and the "grand finale" of the European show, failed to turn out as expected, and the reason becomes clear when we examine the war on the eastern front in the light of these same strategic principles.

Economy of Force. The highest estimate of the size of the Axis force which attacked the Soviets in June, 1941, is three hundred divisions. Hitler himself has said that the front extended for two thousand miles. This would mean an average of one division for every 6.6 miles. In the campaign in the Lowlands and France, where the front was never longer than four hundred miles, it is estimated that the Nazis used seventy-six German divisions, or one division for every 5.26 miles. It would appear, therefore, that a greater economy of force was attempted in the Russian campaign, especially as some fifty or sixty of these original divisions were not German troops but those of Axis allies. Part of Germany's failure to achieve complete success in Russia must be attributed to an underestimation of the opponents' strength.

Surprise. While the outside world was surprised by the Axis attack, it is doubtful whether the Red Army felt the full effect, for it had adopted a strategy which robbed Blitzkrieg of much of its terror. To the Dutch, with their small area of maneuver, the tactical surprise of Blitzkrieg meant strategic surprise. The Soviets, however, used the frontier area as a cushion for the German shock and thereby avoided strategic surprise.

Mobility. The Wehrmacht was a marvel of mobility and came very close to achieving success by faithfulness to this principle. Russian space and terrain and Russian weather, however, proved insuperable obstacles. The swamps and forests in the north made conditions less than ideal for mechanized operations. Unexpected heavy rains slowed the advance in the fall of 1941, and winter completely stopped it. The signal successes of German mobility were confined to the Ukraine and the south. Here the Soviets let the Wehrmacht run until it tripped itself at Stalingrad. Unable to bring up reinforcements in sufficient quantity, it was then forced to retire, leaving its rear guard to be surrounded and destroyed.

Offensive Action. Germany retained the initiative during the first six months of the campaign through the use of constant offensive action and regained it in June, 1942. German strategy, therefore, can be said to have adhered to this principle.

Concentration of Combat Power. As we have seen in the discussion of "Economy of Force," Axis concentration of combat power—the number of divisions per mile—was 27 per cent less on the Russian front than in the Belgian-French campaign. This thin disposition might have been sufficient if the Germans had been able to encircle and "blitz" the Russians, but Russian strategy avoided this by making use of Russian space. Moreover, the Russian tactics of nipping off the mechanized spearhead made it necessary for the tanks to be accompanied by infantry masses, which caused a further drain on German concentrations. Insufficient concentration of combat power was partly overcome by the smaller scope of the 1942 offensive, but later the German strategists magnified the defect by splitting their concentration and pushing two attacks simultaneously, against Stalingrad and the Caucasus. It was the first time in the war that they were guilty of such heresy, and they were punished by being forced to relinquish their hard-won gains in both sectors.

Security. Security was everywhere adequate until late in 1942. Only one strategic point in Europe, Rostov, was given up once it had been occupied by German troops. Rommel's operations in Africa kept the British occupied for a far longer time than was originally planned and may well rank with Stonewall Jackson's diversionary campaign in the Valley of Virginia. The Dieppe raid showed the strength of the security measures taken along the western coast of Europe for the protection of the Nazi rear during the Russian operations.

Cooperation. The analysis of Japan's successes in the second article of this series showed cooperation between the services to be one of the main factors. Cooperation has also been a noteworthy feature of all the German campaigns; the only signal defeat suffered by the Third Reich prior to the Battle of Russia was in the Battle of Britain, where reliance was placed entirely on the air arm. If the Russian invasion did not proceed according to plan, it was not because of any lack of cooperation. The Luftwaffe-submarine combination, according to American press reports, destroyed 50 per cent of the lease-lend convoys to Russia in the summer of 1942. Writing in Red Star, the official Red Army newspaper, Major Vasilov declares that the strategic massing of the German air force for the purpose of creating such complete air superiority in any given sector that the ground forces can achieve their objective is one of the main instruments of the German high command. A higher degree of cooperation between ground combat forces than had heretofore been called for was also found necessary in Russia in order to protect mobile machines against Russian anti-tank methods.

To sum up the Germans' total effort since 1939 one may say that they have accomplished every preliminary step with complete success but failed to achieve their ultimate objectives—the capture of Moscow and the annihilation of the Russian armies. That the "battle of annihilation" is the keynote of German style has long been recognized by writers on war. It has been emphasized in German military literature for centuries; Schlieffen's modern studies of the battles of Leipzig and Cannae are quoted by Tschischwitz and Braun in their works on Blitzkrieg. In their frantic efforts to achieve a similar victory over the Red Army we see revealed the errors in strategy to which their characteristic style led the Germans at Moscow and Stalingrad. The slipping, weaving Russian retreats, always eluding the German pincers, succeeded in saving the Soviet armies from the fate of the Polish and French armies.

When the Blitzkrieg failed in the hills before Moscow, German strategy was changed to suit the means instead of the means being adapted to the strategic ends. The 1942 campaign was launched not against Moscow but in the plains of southern Russia, where armor still retained an edge. There the Wehrmacht won a series of tactical successes that carried it to the Volga and the Caucasus. When it failed to take either Stalingrad or Baku, these preliminary successes were put in their proper perspective. The nature of the German failure was pointed out by General Chuikoff in reply to the question of an American newspaperman. Asked what tactical errors he had observed in the German campaign, the commander of the Soviet Sixty-second Army, which had successfully defended Stalingrad, replied, "The Germans made no tactical mistakes," and went on to explain that it was in the field of strategy that the Nazis had failed. Their tactical successes proved to be Pyrrhic victories leading to no strategic achievement.

Having failed to destroy the Russian army in two years of effort, having lost their domination of the Mediterranean as a result of the Allied victory in North Africa, completely encircled by their opponents and suffering under continued air assaults on their interior communication lines, the Germans now face an attack by the combined forces of their opponents. To counter it their strategy has secured for them the entire continent of Europe as an "area of maneuver" in which they can afford to trade space for time as they did after the defeat at Stalingrad. Hitler, who started out to win another Cannae, is confronted with a situation similar to that which baffled another great exponent of operations on "interior lines," Napoleon, when he found himself surrounded before the Battle of Leipzig. German studies of this battle are no less detailed than those they have made of Cannae. The analogy can hardly escape them.

[This is the concluding article in a series on the strategic styles of our enemies.]

In the Wind

THE WILMINGTON, N. C., Post offers a solution for absenteeism: "Hitler may be insane, but he has more common sense in dealing with this problem than many of our higher-ups in Washington." . . . As for the franchise, "We do not believe that every person should have a vote equal to some other person. Why should a man like Henry Ford have his vote paired against that of a guttersnipe?"

AT LAST the source of economic progress has been discovered. Gerhard Hirschfeld, research director of the Insurance Economics Society of America, reports the results of his researches in Baron's: "The wealth-owning part of our population . . . is at the same time the wealth-producing part. It has always been the most vital link in our economy and is responsible for the economic progress of the nation."

TIP: The Wall Street Journal's gossip column, "Purely Gossip," reports this item of interest to wealth-producers: "Those lampshades made of old Russian imperial bonds may soon be torn apart. They are up to 9, from last year's low of 1, as rumors spread that the U. S. S. R. is about to make a fantastic good-will gesture."

HEALTH NOTE: A refugee doctor who knew the assistant to Hitler's personal surgeon reports that the Führer underwent an operation for a polyp in the throat five years ago. The prognosis at the time was that it would recur in a malignant form in four or five years. The doctor who reports this information moved in the highest medical circles in Germany and is an entirely reliable person.

A TELEPHONE SURVEY by a radio research agency showed that 27.1 per cent of the homes called were listening to Churchill's address to Congress on May 19, an estimated 14,045,000 listeners. This compares with 27.7 per cent, an estimated 14,290,200 listeners, for Roosevelt's Congressional message on January 7. Night broadcasts have many more listeners. Roosevelt's talk to the coal miners at 10 p.m. on May 2 reached 56.7 per cent of the homes called, or some 43,761,000 listeners.

IN ITS ACCOUNT of the death of Edsel Ford, the New York Times explained his draft status thus: "In deference to his father's hatred of war, he threw himself wholeheartedly into war production, and he was exempted from military service as an essential production man."

FESTUNG EUROPA: A police investigation of the mysterious disappearance of a number of young Norwegian women has been stopped on orders from the Nazi authorities. . . . The Nazi mayor and aldermen of a Belgian town have been denied life insurance by Belgian and German companies.

Communists and British Labor

BY KINGSLEY MARTIN

London, May 26, by Cable

THE B. B. C. made an amusing comment on Moscow's decision to end the Comintern when it dryly remarked that the only protesting voice so far came from the Independent Labor Party. It is a point worth explaining.

The Independent Labor Party, which is no longer an important political force in England, has quarreled violently with the Third International. Its complaint is certainly not in support of the Comintern. It is a rebuke to Stalin for Soviet nationalism, which repudiated the conception of world revolution. For many years Stalin has seemed to be moving toward this view. Stages in his metamorphosis were his defeat of Trotsky and his execution of the Five-Year plans, which accomplished an extraordinary feat in making the U. S. S. R. strong enough to fight Germany without making it dependent upon foreign capitalism. Then came the attempt to save peace and gain security for the U. S. S. R. through collaboration with the bourgeois governments at Geneva, another sign of Moscow's nationalist rather than world-revolutionary view. Only in Spain has the Comintern had a real chance since the early post-World War period. In China the Comintern was defeated, and in Germany its errors were partly responsible for Hitler's triumph. Recently the Comintern has been maintained as a reserve weapon to be used only if the democracies became open enemies of the U. S. S. R. Now Stalin smooths the path for an alliance with America and Britain by formally liquidating the conspiratorial side of communism, which has been useful to reactionary politicians in Britain and, above all, in America.

On the international side, therefore, almost everyone is pleased. As a propaganda move, nothing could be better, because the basis of the Axis is the Anti-Comintern Pact. It is often forgotten that Germany's satellites—Italy, Hungary, Rumania, and others—are tied to Germany only by adherence to the Anti-Comintern Pact. Now that Stalin has ended the Communist International he should be in a stronger position to ask the liquidation of all that remains of the Fascist International. This is even more necessary since there is still a tendency on both sides of the Atlantic to build up as the heads of liberated states individuals who would normally work more easily with the Anti-Comintern Pact than with Soviet Russia. On the continent of Europe, where the division between Communists and other forces of resistance has largely disappeared, the formal end of the Comintern should make real unity for the future much easier.

The question for Britain is whether the left can use the opportunity to achieve greater unity. The Labor Party, at the Whitsuntide conference, has as the chief item on its agenda the question of Communist affiliation. Because of its connection with Moscow and its consequent policies and divided loyalty, the Communist Party of Great Britain has long been disaffiliated. Now it supports the war, and there is an important drive by Communists throughout the country to come into the fold. Owing to the method whereby trade unions instruct delegates how to vote at the conference, it is possible to forecast the vote beforehand with some accuracy. It looked last week as though the move for affiliation would be defeated by a substantial majority. The principal argument of the Executive in its correspondence with the Communist Party and in many pamphlets and leaflets is that it is impossible for the Communist Party to be loyal to the Labor Party because of its constitutional allegiance to Moscow decisions. Its change of attitude toward the war in October, 1939, and its anti-war policy until 1941 are added points in the argument of the Executive. Now that this particular argument has been removed, many hope that affiliation may after all carry the day. The Executive might at least offer to meet representatives of the Communist Party to discuss whether, under the new circumstances, they could rely on Communist Party loyalty. These matters will be discussed by the Labor Party Executive on May 28.

Statements made by the Daily Herald and orthodox trade-union leaders suggest that it will be difficult to persuade Transport House to change its mind. Labor leaders may argue that Communist policy will still follow Moscow blindly and, from past experience, that Communists aiming at revolution cannot be trusted colleagues for Socialists who hold a gradualist philosophy. The Herald argues that it would be logical for the Communist Party to dissolve and for its members to join the Labor Party as individuals. This argument would apply to all constituent bodies of the Labor Party, and is important, not for its logic, but because it is an indication of reluctance once again to begin the struggle with organized communism within the party.

One other viewpoint is strongly expressed. In many minds the overriding consideration is the fear that the working-class movement will again split into warring fragments, making victory easy for the reactionary forces, who will regain power as they did at the end of the last war when they defeated all hopes for post-war improvement. I have heard the view expressed by a distinguished figure in the Second International that nothing would so encourage the forces of progress throughout Europe and the world as unity within British labor. Though memories of past bitterness would make collaboration between most of the present Labor and Communist leaders difficult, there are large numbers of younger men and women, in the ranks of both labor and communism, who will insist on unity, one way or another. Stalin follows Lenin in telling the Communist Party to think out socialism in relation to particular British traditions. That must mean that it would abandon its conspiratorial attitude, a natural inheritance of the Third International, born of the revolution in czarist Russia, where liberalism had never taken root and freedom of speech and the right of association never existed. The tactics to be applied in the Western democracies ought to be founded upon a recognition of their strong moral and humanitarian tradition. And so we hope that at Whitsuntide, at any rate in the country where Socialists and Communists must necessarily work together during the war, unity based on a new realism and a new determination to achieve socialism may be realized.

De Gaulle—Giraud

DE GAULLE and Giraud—all right. But Giraud and De Gaulle—disaster for French democracy.

The issue is not unity alone. Unity was certain, once arrangements for the meeting in Algiers were confirmed. Unity was a fact when the British and American general staffs realized that they could never land in France with a divided North Africa. Once the realization came, action was simple. The British became less ardent in their support of De Gaulle; the Americans allowed Giraud to feel that their support of him was not unconditional. The two generals had no choice. For an eternally divided North Africa invited eternal occupation.

But it is to the greatest interest of the democratic cause that within the formal unity to be established De Gaulle should hold the real leadership. Everything speaks for it. Behind De Gaulle is the new "Council of Resistance," uniting all the anti-Vichy forces in France. Behind Giraud is M. Boisson, who declared, even on March 30, 1943, that West Africa should remain faithful to Marshal Pétain. Behind Giraud is René Prioux, general of the French armies in North Africa, who, even on March 27, 1943, was addressing his officers as follows: "The difference between Vichy and the Marshal is evident. General Giraud has always kept this difference in mind. Lately

Drawing by Rivero Gil

Charon: "I don't know how I'm going to solve the transportation problem."

he declared that no one may attack Pétain, while everyone must attack Vichy." Always the same tactic of indirectly asking for support of Pétain while laying all the blame, in the classic military tradition, upon the civilians.

And it is not only M. Boisson, General Prioux, General Nogués, or M. Peyrouton who can never be "united" with the people of France. Hundreds and hundreds of minor officials, appointed and kept in office by former Vichyites who under General Giraud are running the military and civil administration in North Africa, will always remain a threat to French democracy. They were fascist-minded before the outbreak of the war; they were fascist during the war; they will continue to intrigue and to work against democracy if a "non-political" general like Giraud continues to protect them. Only if the influence and the authority of a truly "political" general like De Gaulle, backed by all the forces of resistance in France, are fully exercised in the new council created in Algiers can the French people have a guaranty that they will not be stabbed in the back from North Africa.

Unity, yes. But under De Gaulle.

BY ARGUS

KONSTANZ is an old and very beautiful German city. On May 18 the St. Galle Tageblatt, the newspaper of a nearby Swiss town, described the daily life in Konstanz. "Beautiful Konstanz," it said, "is steeped in gloom, and people have little hope of a better future." One reason is that the local grenadier regiment was destroyed to the last man before Stalingrad. Another is the so-called "total mobilization." "The order closing all retail stores swept over Konstanz like a tempest. Only a few shops remain open." A third cause of the gloom is the scarcity of goods, which "has reached grotesque proportions." Some fantastic happenings will illustrate. "A man climbed into a ground-floor apartment in Konstanz and stole the blanket from the bed of a sleeping child. A working woman lured an eight-year-old girl into a house and robbed her of her shoes."

But the most revealing thing is a placard headed Verboten which is displayed in all the stores. It warns customers that "conversation in the shops must be limited to the Hitler salute and the remarks required by the transaction." This prohibition of all conversation is for the Swiss newspaper proof of "rising irritation."

In the middle of May, for the first time under Hitler, a professor in a German university was condemned to have his head cut off. His name was Kurt Huber, and he was fifty years old. For seventeen years he had taught psychology at the University of Munich. He had never, so far as is known, had anything to do with politics.

The execution of Professor Huber was the climax of a series of happenings at the University of Munich about which vague reports have already reached America. Since it is possible that this is a development of great significance, we welcome the discovery of a somewhat more detailed account in the Swedish newspaper Trots Allt.

In Easter week a high party official addressed the students of both sexes at the university. With customary Nazi arrogance he made remarks about the superiority of men and the inferiority of women. He seems also to have used insulting and dirty expressions. Whereupon the unheard of happened: the masculine listeners, not the feminine, exploded. The students began to stamp their feet—the traditional way of expressing disapproval in German universities—and to call out "Enough." Soon the more spirited members of the audience began to leave the hall, and the meeting ended in chaos.

The next day some students distributed a typewritten leaflet in the university buildings. It was an attack on the Nazi Party, which they accused of "crippling the student's intellect in the most important period of his development." It demanded that students stay away from assemblies at which "party satraps" and "party satellites" spoke. One of its distributors was a student who had lost a leg at Stalingrad and who wore the highest decoration a soldier can receive—the iron cross, first class.

The university was in an uproar. The police and the Gestapo moved in and made some twenty arrests. Among those arrested were the cripple of Stalingrad and—some days later—Professor Huber and his wife. It is not known just how Huber was connected with the outbreak at the meeting or with the leaflet, but it is known that he was brought before Herr Giesler, the Gauleiter of Munich, and that there was a violent scene between them. The Special Court for the Protection of State and Party then held numerous secret trials—all separate. The younger students were sentenced to imprisonment for many years or for life, but ten of the older ones, among them the cripple of Stalingrad and Professor Huber, were condemned to be beheaded.

Two other things should be mentioned. The first is Gauleiter Giesler's statement to the leaders of the National Socialist Women's Organization, whom he called together to give them directions about the girl students. He said: "Unfortunately our attention has just been drawn to the university, and unfortunately we have seized only one professor. But we know that at least twenty more of his kind are hiding there." The second is this: Because of some connection with the Munich affair a high official in the nearby city of Salzburg was arrested—a nobleman and a Regierungsdirektor, Dr. Hans von Rittinger. He was sentenced to ten years' imprisonment because of a "hostile attitude toward the state and party." The official announcement said that his "frivolity" during the trial had been particularly repulsive.

Mother and Son

THOMAS WOLFE'S LETTERS TO HIS MOTHER, JULIA ELIZABETH WOLFE. Edited with an Introduction by John Skally Terry. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.

THE letters of a genius are always interesting even when they are dull, and these letters of Wolfe, like his books, are dull. Every other letter seems to be about money and how it gets that way. And when finally money does begin to flow his way, then come the lawsuits. Poor Wolfe discovers that even a halfwit has the right, in a democracy, to sue you, bleed you, though he hasn't a leg to stand on. In the course of a short life Wolfe seems to have discovered many things which the ordinary schoolboy knows instinctively. One of the most amusing statements is the one concerning Professor Baker of Harvard. "I think he's bitterly disappointed because I began teaching, but he never told me by what means I could live." Aye, there's the rub. And there is something pathetic about the inability of editors and publishers, in a land that worships money, power, fame, and success, to keep alive a man of genius whose needs are few. To receive $250 for something like 30,000 words is the sort of encouragement which makes a writer wonder if he wouldn't be better off digging ditches or robbing banks.

There is also something amusing and pathetic about the valiant and, to my mind, misguided efforts of the good Max Perkins to whip the amorphous volume of Wolfe's writings into some acceptable form. The only book of Wolfe's I could ever finish was the little volume called "The Story of a Novel." I was violently moved by this account and convinced, moreover, that a crime had been committed against Wolfe by the very man who tried to help him. It is quite possible, to be sure, that without editorial assistance Wolfe might never have brought any of his books to a conclusion. But would that have mattered? Just as his mother tried to keep him a child, so his publishers tried to keep him readable. A child who is weaned at the age of three and a half is never weaned; a boy who is kept in curls until he is a young man never becomes a young man; a giant who sleeps with his mother until it is time to find a mate never finds a mate. And a young genius who begins like a Niagara can never be made into an acceptable wooden novelist such as publishers are constantly looking for. Left to his own resources, encouraged to do as he pleased, Thomas Wolfe might have committed suicide at an early age, leaving to posterity a grandiose unfinished opus which would have been the pride of American letters.

The saddest thing about Wolfe is the feeling he gives of being alone in the world. And though he was always tied to his mother by the umbilical cord, he gives the impression frequently that he had been abandoned even by her. In trying to tell her what his first novel is about, he writes: "It says that we are born alone—all of us who ever lived or will live—that we live alone, and die alone, and that we are strangers to one another, and never come to know one another." Quite naturally this feeling was accompanied by a mania to devour the world; it was the only means left him to connect with the world. Instead of incorporating the world, however, he dies of glut. In this he reminds one of Balzac. The pattern of his life is that of the treadmill. He becomes a victim of work. No death, no phoenix rising from the ashes. Just a huge machine waging a hopeless battle with time.

His malady was gigantism, in all its manifestations. His tentacles spread everywhere, but they never light upon the golden shears which will liberate him and give him atonement. He is a river with a blind mouth, a moving panorama which erases itself with every turn of the bend. He will remember everything from the day he was born, and record it with the exactitude of a physicist, but though he labor like a fiend he will never succeed in laying the cornerstone of the temple he longs to inhabit. He remains the infant Gargantua, stumbling through the world nursery and scattering debris everywhere. An utterly humorless prodigy to boot. Alone, misshapen, misunderstood. A misfit. A giant for whom a toothache assumes the proportions of a tragedy: something to write home about, something to wrest a tear from that monument to real estate who could have been a writer too—if she had had the training.

His admirers are right in regarding him as a genuine American. He had all their faults and all their virtues. "I could never be anything but American if I tried," he writes. Yet again and again he expresses his disgust with "the huge, loud, noisy madhouse" that America is. And then, like all genuine Americans, he can add: "We have it in us to be a really great people, I think, whenever we find what is sometimes called a soul." In this utterance we have an intimation of the real tragedy which confronts every great American artist. For, until that soul emerges, how are we ever going to stop killing off our creative spirits? What place is there for a poet in a garden where automobile parts are at a premium? With Wolfe's death we are left with at most two or three writers of unmistakable genius. The others are the successful writers whom the mothers worship.

HENRY MILLER

The Mexican Storm

THE WIND THAT SWEEPED MEXICO. 100 Pages of Text and Captions by Anita Brenner and 184 Photographs Assembled by George R. Leighton. Harper and Brothers. $3.75.

THE Mexican Revolution has been sputtering and exploding in our back yard for more than three decades. No upheaval of modern times has been continuous spot news for so long or so thoroughly covered by reporters, sociologists, artists, and photographers. Nor was there ever a more colorful, dramatic, and "photogenic" setting. Indeed, the Mexican Revolution may be said to have initiated a new period in modern news photography, marking the great turn from the unchanging scenes and solid celebrities posed before a tripod-supported camera in the settled world of the nineteenth century to the swift action shots of the world in motion and flux of the twentieth. "The wind that swept Mexico," in retrospect, proves to have been one of the first gusts of a tempest that since has been sweeping the earth.

It is not easy to give a satisfactory account of a world which is changing rapidly while you observe it. One needs more than fixed instants: their succession must form points on a continuously altering trajectory. In writing, this requires a grasp of origins and a sense of direction. In photographic illustration, the separate pictures must make a sequence, like stills which suggest that they are parts of a moving picture.

In this first attempt to portray the Mexican Revolution by uniting photography and text, both collaborators were admirably suited to their tasks, and the result is a perfect unity of text and illustration. Anita Brenner has been reporting on Mexico for almost as many years as are covered by these events. She has never written better, or as well. She has outgrown the sometimes annoying habit of seeking for the smart phrase without regard for its consequence to truth; yet her style has not lost its liveliness. Errors of detail are few and minor, less than in any previous book that has been written on Mexico. Interpretation, too, leaves almost nothing to be desired—perhaps a recognition that the Diaz regime was part of a larger setting of later nineteenth-century stability (in Europe, in the United States, in Latin America) and that not "cash-and-carry economy" but primitive subsistence agriculture is the shock absorber that cushions Mexico against the world's economic storms. The most remarkable quality of her hundred-page text is a clean simplicity of outline which could only have been achieved in the case of such complex events by long years of meditation.

What the complexities were which had to be reduced to simplicity without being simplified out of existence cannot be more than suggested here. Was Pancho Villa a bandit or a revolutionist? Is the government a military dictatorship? a fraternity of corrupt officials enriching themselves by private graft and public pillage? a channel through which the will of the masses can find some expression? Are the professed governmental ideals devices for manipulating the people, or do they—and to what extent?—take possession of those who profess them? Is Lombardo Toledano an agent of Stalinism, or of the government for working upon the masses, or of the masses for working upon the government? In brief space, without imbalance and without loss of concrete aliveness, Miss Brenner has managed to answer an enormous number of questions to which there are no simple yes-or-no answers.

George R. Leighton has shown no less expertness in his selection of the news photographs to complement—or be complemented by—Miss Brenner's text. In the new art of photo-illustration, as in any art, selection is a crucial matter. Leighton's job was not merely to track down and sift the mountain of amateur and professional news photographs, but to steep himself in the story he was illustrating until he could judge them for relevance, representative character, expressive quality. This telling of a continuous story from photographs is analogous to the cutting and montage in the editing of a film. It is so well done here that it is no longer possible to tell whether Miss Brenner wrote the text around the pictures or Mr. Leighton chose the pictures to suit the text.

And what pictures! The aged, stony-faced dictator, full of years and honors; the glitter of Porfirian society as only the camera can catch it—a world apparently as settled as the melancholy high plateau and snow-capped sierra that form its background. The reverse side of the Porfirian peace—beggarly Indians, newly shot corpses lying on the plaza with men and women passing unconcerned in the brilliant sunshine. Guerrilla camps scattered through the brush; armies traveling atop captured freight trains with their women, children, dogs, pots, umbrellas; naive excited peons in arms; shops being raided; Villa's "golden boys" dashing on horseback right up to the camera. The "men of the Revolution"—Madero, diminutive, weak, almost ludicrous, yet unswervingly devoted to such ideals as could move him; Villa's jovial, sensual face; the melancholy dreamer's eyes of Zapata; the pedantic self-importance of Carranza; debauchery and cruelty cut deep into the face of Huerta; donhommerie on the round cheeks of Obregón. Ebb and flow of uncertain fortunes—Villa trying out his expansive seat on the presidential chair with the grin of a small boy while Zapata, huge hat on knee, sits bemused beside him; Carranza opening the Constitutional Convention; Carranza lying dead after assassination; the tough, corrupt, sybaritic face of Morones as official labor lieutenant; the lean, ascetic, Machiavelli-Savonarola face of his successor, Lombardo; the shining, impassive, metallic-bronze head of an archbishop under a bejeweled miter; Calles proclaiming full stop to the victorious Revolution; Cárdenas earnestly receiving a petition from dissatisfied Indians; a new concrete road through a timeless landscape; the British ambassador leaving in a huff after the oil expropriation; astonished Mexicans learning that their country has entered the war, and on the side of the traditional enemy, the Yankee.

So both text and pictures leave the Mexicans facing what puzzled attention a new and uncertain future, asking what fate awaits them alone on this continent with no rival European power to counterbalance the "Colossus of the North" turned "Good Neighbor," and what fate awaits their unfinished Revolution. The question at the end is as right as the rest of the text and pictures.

BERTRAM D. WOLFE

This Paranoid Reich

IS GERMANY INCURABLE? By Richard Brickner, M.D.
J. B. Lippincott Company. $3.

AN INSISTENT need of our troubled times is to account for the phenomenon that has confounded the nations. The responsible "it," whatever its nature, was made in Germany. Its sources must be sought there. Political, economic, social, geographic conditions have played leading parts in the dénouement. All that is abundantly recognized. Beneath them lies a deeper level of interpretation, inevitably psychological. The phenomenal, convulsive "it" is a collective mental aberration. Germany is in the throes of a psychic obsession. The key clue to the most disastrous regression in the march of civilization is held by psychiatry. Upon that thesis, Dr. Brickner builds his argument and arrays his evidence. In that conclusion and its supreme significance the present reviewer fully concurs.

Too long have historians, statesmen, economists, militarists, and the ever articulate journalists held the field and the public ear. The claim of experts in ways of mind—psychologists and psychiatrists—to a voice in the interpretation of the doings of men recorded as history presages the verdict of the future. Nazism—ideas and behavior—belongs with such derangements as witchcraft and the Inquisition to the mass-pathology of the human mind. Had the phenomenon stopped short of war, it would still have formed a major problem for reflective minds: a global upheaval has bombed it into universal concern. Germany is psychopathic. The ideas, traits, human relations, behavior-patterns, policies dominant in Germany are in reality symptoms of grave mental disorder. Is Germany incurable? is the tense question for today and for post-war consideration.

Germany's psychosis is definitely paranoia—a term thus raised from medical to international consequence. "Its presence as the predominant culture trait sets the Germans apart as a special world problem among Western nations." The diagnosis is unmistakable. The passion for domination, and regulation, in matters great and small, the chronic suspiciousness, the fancied grievances, the absurd megalomania, the irresponsible logic, the blindness to others' psychology, the scrapping of inhibitions, the fanatical assumption of a mission: these make the context for the paranoid conviction that he, the paranoid, and his actions are ever right and that the rest of the world is wrong and despicable. This typically paranoid complex is certified in every psychiatric text.

Paranoid trends have entered deep and wide into the German character; have been sanctioned and rewarded. In that soil, long prepared and recently fertilized, Nazism found congenial roots and attained a rank growth. Mass delusions, however virulent, are never universal. A portion of the population remains fairly immune to the contagion, and provides the nucleus of recovery. But until the sane members in German communities can cure their fellows of their paranoid thrall, the nations united in the cause of sanity no less than of freedom must accept the warden's role of rendering the patient's delusions and impulses harmless.

Dr. Brickner's mode of presentation of his thesis and its evidence is not conducive to overcoming the resistance which it meets in lay circles. The same conclusion is more forcefully expounded by H. G. Baynes, British psychologist, in his "Germany Possessed." It is likewise the accounting of Rolfe Tell in "The Eternal Ger-Maniäc," of Sebastian Haffner, of E. O. Lorimer, of Colonel Minshall (only the last is cited by Dr. Brickner), and of others.

Dr. Brickner's presentation lacks the complete demonstration of which the thesis is capable. His illustrations, medical and cultural, are none too relevant. Unaccented is the paranoid's constant recourse to lying and deception, so conspicuous in Hitler's make-up and adopted as a policy by his regime. That primary trait-symptom of the paranoid—and that is why you can't do business with him—is emphasized in the able study of the psychopathic personality by Dr. Cleckley published under the apt title "The Mask of Sanity." What baffles the layman is the fact that an ignorant, mediocre, ne'er-do-well, hopelessly insane, can attain to such a career

YALE

A SOCIAL PSYCHOLOGY OF WAR AND PEACE

MARK A. MAY

In this timely volume the Director of the Institute of Human Relations in Yale University vigorously challenges the popular conception that the underlying causes of war are found in man's fighting instincts. Dr. May holds that human nature is neither belligerent nor peaceful, but neutral, and that the bias is in man's environment. War and peace are the results of man's conditioning and education. The book shows how men learn to hate and fight, to love and defend, and to follow leaders. It ends with a discussion of the psychological conditions of peace. $2.75 in a world presumably ruled by sane men. The paranoid mask is indeed deceptive. It deceived—though that deception alone is not the full accounting—the diplomats. It did not deceive the psychiatrists, nor so keen a lay observer as Mrs. Lorimer, author of "What Germany Needs": "Hitler is not a person, but mental disease incarnate."

The astounding and appalling phenomenon presents two problems—the insane Führer and the obsessed Reich. Dr. Brickner concentrates upon the latter and all but neglects the former—a questionable tour de force. The realistic fact remains that Nazi Germany was created by the acceptance of a paranoid and the delegation to him of unlimited power. That's the "it" that can't happen here. The idolatry of the person of Adolf Hitler is not a paranoid trait; it reveals a flaw in the German character evidenced by the university students' slogan: "We spit on freedom!" There are many complications in the cure of Germany.

The psychopathic accounting of Nazism must make its way despite the prejudice against conceding a place in affairs of state and the common weal to the psychologist and the psychiatrist. Indeed, even in intelligent circles one encounters an uncritical distrust or even a cheap sneer at both confusers of familiar common sense by technical jargon. None the less, had a competent psychiatrist accompanied Mr. Chamberlain on his mission to Munich, he would have reported to His Majesty's government that appeasing a paranoiac was putting out a fire with gasoline. Where the blind politicians discovered evidences of greatness, psychologists saw through mask and myth to the ghastly reality. "The man in the ivory tower is actually the practical man of affairs," concludes Dr. Brickner.

Aesthetics as Libertarian Faith

ART AND FREEDOM. A Historical and Biographical Interpretation of the Relations Between the Ideas of Beauty, Use, and Freedom in Western Civilization from the Greeks to the Present Day. By Horace M. Kallen. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. Two Volumes. $6.50.

THESE two passionate volumes must be viewed primarily as a confession of faith. Thirty years, more or less, in the making, as our author tells us, they are packed with an enormous erudition. But they will impress you chiefly because they glow to incandescence with Mr. Kallen's unqualified belief in the individual's fundamental right to develop without outward restraints and with his conviction that art is "the bravest, the truest" way in which man can "affirm his freedom within, establish it without," and by means of which he "conquers fate and defeats God."

Indeed Mr. Kallen's passions seek such a violent affirmation that even when you sympathize with his prejudices you are likely to find yourself wondering whether you can trust the judgment of a man whose philosophizing seems to be so preponderantly determined by the need for self-assertion. You are reading for instance about Baumgarten, remembered only because he gave aesthetics its name, and you run into the following characterization: "Alexander Gottlieb Baumgarten, an academic packager of philosophic sedatives passed down from Leibnitz." Is this not a waste of passion? Why send out the battle wagons of invective to reduce an obscure little atoll which no one is holding against us? The explanation is perhaps to be found in Mr. Kallen's fervid dedication to liberty. And I imagine also that it is his fervid dedication that accounts for Mr. Kallen's style. If you prefer quiet, masculine prose, stripped of all adiposity, you will be irritated frequently by orchestral effects and by an undisciplined torrent of words which all too frequently interfere with the direct grasp of ideas.

Mr. Kallen relates the history of aesthetics to the history of our Western culture from the standpoint of the central anxiety of our day. He seeks to show that the various conceptions that have been held since Plato regarding art and the relation of art to use are an integral part of the human struggle for freedom. But since theory is always someone's theory, Mr. Kallen brings biographical data to bear on the interpretation. This bald statement of the content of the work cannot, however, give an idea of its scope. Mr. Kallen's historical exposition covers close to a thousand pages, and touches not only on most of the well-known figures in aesthetics but on many well-nigh unknown names as well. To realize how varied and extensive is the range of its historical reference, one must read the book from cover to cover.

Our author finds in history two conceptions of freedom in opposition to each other. One is false and makes for privilege, being really a rationalization of oppressive tendencies. The other is the true one, and it issues finally in our day in the belief in human equality characteristic of democratic societies. The interpretation is carried out in terms of a number of assumptions to which the critical reader will wish the author had given more explicit or more extended attention in these pages. I call them "assumptions" because I do not find that they were drawn from, or modified by, the inquiry, but seem rather to have contrived it from the start. The most important of these assumptions is that freedom consists of the outward expansion of the vital urges of each individual man, to check which is tyranny. This means that each man has the right to seek happiness according to his own personal idiosyncrasies. So far as I am able to discover, this right is proclaimed without reservations, and somehow, though our author absolutely hates all absolutes, he holds that "the right to be different" is an "ultimate of human personality." Another assumption seems to be that change for its own sake is a good, and stasis is evil. Still another seems to be that in the warfare to the death between freedom and tyranny ideas are weapons. Still another is that art and freedom are at bottom synonymous terms, for "whatever opens new ways to impulses held back, to wishes unsatisfied, to feelings shut in," is "art fundamentally."

The advantage of Mr. Kallen's historical interpretations cannot escape anyone. True, he gives us a rather crude version of history; but how simple it becomes, and how easy does he make it for us to take sides. The battle is between light, goodness, and truth on the one hand and darkness, evil, and error on the other. On one side—I mean, to the left—you have sages like John Dewey, Jefferson, or William of Occam; or poets like Byron or Shelley; or children of nature like Rousseau. And opposite them the enemies of man, the false prophets who preach otherworldly hope, the philosophical totalitarians, the anti-nominalists and absolutists. Heading them you will find men like St. Augustine, St. Thomas, and St. Ignatius, "who founded the rationalizations which the godmen and prophets of the latest dispensation, the Hitlers and Mussolinis, the Stalins and Francos, improve upon and surpass." Above them all you will find the arch-totalitarian Plato, who, according to Mr. Kallen, was senile when he wrote "The Laws."

In addition to making history easily intelligible, Mr. Kallen's method has the added advantage of enabling him to dispose of men and philosophic systems that he does not like, without the bother of too minute a logical refutation, by the simple device of exposing the motives back of the ideas. Thus of Plato we are told that "the notion of Beauty as ultimate, universal, eternal, and supernatural . . . shares with the rest of the Platonic Otherworld the service of compensating the thinker for his defeat and degradation in this Hitherworld." Or take Kant. He was deeply devoted to freedom, and translated into the conception of the kingdom of ends the revolutionary ideas of his age. But we must not be fooled by his devotion. "Compensatory to the actualities and habits of his conformed existence rather than expressive of them, the idea of freedom was nevertheless a projection and syncretic symbol of all hurt feelings, the frustrated impulses and deep resentments of his personal history."

Unfortunately the simplicity of Mr. Kallen's version of historical development becomes occasionally troubled by cases which refuse to be rammed into his categories, in spite of their accommodating roominess. This is the case, for instance, with Schopenhauer, whose philosophy was "transcendentalist but not totalitarian." The fact that there are transcendentalists who are not totalitarians and naturalists who are, must have given Mr. Kallen trouble, but I find no reflection of that trouble in these pages. Again, there are in the book several references to periods in which art, though deserving the name in its eulogistic sense, was nevertheless the willing servant of despotism. But if art is synonymous with true freedom, how can it express totalitarian interests without loss of quality? How can art survive and prosper under tyrannical rule and even seek to glorify it?

"The world," says Santayana, "is full of conscript minds, only they are in different armies, and nobody is fighting to be free, but each to make his own conscription universal."

Fiction in Review

I AM struck by the naive frankness with which Jerome Weidman's "The Lights Around the Shore" (Simon and Schuster, $2.50) is being announced as Mr. Weidman's first non-hard-boiled novel. It is exactly as if an optical company were to announce its new lenses as its first lenses which enabled the wearer to see with both eyes. For to say of a novelist that he is, or was, hard-boiled is not a neutral term of description. It is an evaluation and not a flattering one. It announces of a writer that he is so handicapped that he is capable of seeing and depicting only those aspects of life which fit into a single, highly restricted line of vision.

On the other hand, Mr. Weidman's own recognition of his earlier limitations is something else again, and much to be commended. Indeed, the best to be said of "The Lights Around the Shore"—for it is a failure—is that it has an admirable intention and an excellent "idea." It is the story of a fifteen-year-old boy who is catapulted into maturity by the double experience of being taken out of his native environment and discovering that the aunt to whom he is deeply attached is ready to sell him out for a pretty dubious lover—a first-rate point of departure for a novel of psychological exploration. But people baffle Mr. Weidman. He intended his novel to be a mystery of the kind which so much attracted Henry James, in which the secret element is the clue element in the human compound, but what he has actually produced is a novel which is full of pointless mystery: one wonders what all the psychological shooting is for. And it seems to me that his failure casts a revealing light on his earlier successful novels.

Take, for instance, Mr. Weidman's adolescent boy, his central character. Peter Landor is of Hungarian parentage, not Jewish, semi-proletarian. His aunt has been in America only a few years; she earned the money for their trip to Europe by working in a factory; the suitor whom she leaves behind is the proprietor of a candy store. All these facts are told us and even have their place in the narrative, but they are never shown to us. Peter's origins play no slightest part in the characterization of a boy who is at the age when "class" is of poignant importance and in a situation—on an ocean liner—where he would be keenest to measure himself against the new social experience. He travels third class, for example, but visits in first class with hardly a trace of the emotion of inferiority: there is one brief flurry with a steward, one interesting (though more appropriate to a thirteen-year-old than a fifteen-year-old) interchange with another boy passenger. He shows no interest in the mechanics of the ship, in the complications of landings and boat trains, in the million novelties of arriving in a strange country. His unawareness of his surroundings is so acute that when he returns to America and gives his high-school teacher his diary to read (another false note, by the way, for if Peter is anything, he is a boy who would rather die than expose himself by such a gesture), it comes as a surprise that anyone who had ever taught Peter should be disappointed that the diary is so bare. Is Peter supposed to be bright? Mr. Weidman failed to get it down on paper.

Or one could go through the book page by page, examining so many of his details of characterization. They are false, off-center, unconvincing. There is the matter of the aunt's hands, as an instance: her nails are scarred and shabby from factory work, she has to be shown how to care for them; but a young woman who would not know better than to let her hands betray her in this fashion would also betray her class in a hundred other ways which seem never to have occurred to Mr. Weidman—in her clothes, her speech, her table manners, even in the way she would receive the suggestion of a first manicure.

So then one wonders how a writer whose eye and ear are famed, from his previous novels, for their sharpness, as Mr. Weidman's are, could so have missed fire in this novel; and I think the answer is—cruelly—that neither Mr. Weidman nor any other of the narrow "realists" of the hard-boiled school ever does have an eye or ear really to be counted on. Like a general staff equipped with a series of plans to cover a series of possible military engagements, but with no military genius which can pull out Plan A for such a situation and Plan B for another, such writers have just enough talent to serve them in pat situations within rigidly limited spheres; on their own in a new situation, they go to pieces. We forget, as a matter of fact, how much of their "characterizing" we always do for them, how readily, once the button is pressed, we come across with the proper conditioned responses. A detective-story writer, for instance—and the hard-boiled novelists are symbiotic with the detective-story writers—has only to tell us of a certain individual that he has a gold tooth in the front of his mouth and that he wears a striped vest with a heavy gold chain, and we supply all the rest of the characterization, from his crudeness and greed to his lascivious conduct with women and his sentimental regard for his mother. For the working purposes of a story, if not for literature, once the proper button has been pressed, a character has been created.

And of course the temptation to this kind of speed-writing characterization is particularly great when a novelist deals with the racial minorities; after all, prejudice itself is a form of speed-writing. Jews especially are a pushover for this sort of thing. In the past, when Mr. Weidman wrote about Jews his ability to reproduce the rhythms of Jewish-American speech effectively substituted for the real work of a novelist. In "The Lights Around the Shore," when for the second time he writes about non-Jews and also attempts to write on an emotional level that demands that people be whole people instead of stage props, he proves how different it is to provide us with the recognizable paraphernalia of a "type" and really draw a character.

"The White Face" (McBride, $2.75), a first novel by Carl Ruthhaven Offord, a young Negro newspaperman, is worth study as a sociological report on one of the less well-known aspects of the Negro problem—the activities of fascist agents in Harlem. On the principle of divide and rule, and taking advantage of the bad feeling that already exists between the Harlem Negroes and their Jewish landlords, shopkeepers, and domestic employers, fascist agitators are evidently finding Harlem fertile territory for anti-Semitic propaganda. Mr. Offord's book may not be a good novel, but it is a chilling account of something that is much more than a footnote to the problems confronting us on the home front.

According to the publishers' information, C. S. Forester, author of "Captain Horatio Hornblower," spent only a few weeks on a warship of the Royal Navy gathering the material for "The Ship" (Little, Brown, $2.50); he must have studied assiduously. For Mr. Forester's latest novel is a perfect encyclopedia of naval information, only accidentally fictionalized but fascinating technical reading. Of course, as in all the sea-battle stories of this war which I have read, in proportion as the technical information of "The Ship" is detailed and clear, the people are misty and oversimplified; but perhaps that is an accurate reflection of ship life in time of war; perhaps it is even the saving of people that they can at least put up the appearance of subordinating themselves to the giant machinery they serve.

RECORDS

ON Victor's May list is Griffes's Poem for flute and orchestra, played by Joseph Mariano with the Eastman-Rochester Symphony under Hanson (11-8349, $1.05). Most of the piece—which is to say all but the dance in the middle—is very fine; and it is astonishing in its demonstration of powers that are matured and assured. Griffes absorbed a great deal from others; but he absorbed what he could make his own and use as his own—as the medium of his own imagination and feeling. The performance seems good, and is well recorded; the surfaces of my review copy are poor.

Tchaikovsky's "Manfred" Symphony, of which Victor has issued a first recording made by Sevitzy with the Indianapolis Symphony (Set 940, $7.88), is rarely played—the only concert performance I can recall being Toscanini's with the New York Philharmonic. It was the first work by Tchaikovsky that he played; and it caused me to remark that Toscanini apparently was justifying his previous avoidance of Tchaikovsky by playing one of his weakest works. Rehearing it now I have found some of the thematic material as good as any of Tchaikovsky's (this is a mature work which stands, in order of composition, between the Fourth and Fifth Symphonies), and the use of the orchestra superb as always; but worse than an occasional passage of inferior quality is the lack of concentration throughout, which makes the work wearying. The performance is excellent, and is recorded with the clarity, spaciousness, and magnificence of sound of Victor's most recent orchestral recording. But many surfaces of my copy are poor, and sides 8 and 13 waver badly in pitch.

Fauré's incidental music to "Pelléas et Mélisande" is a sort of tonal cream-puff, valuable only as an occasion for some of the Boston Symphony's fabulously playing under Koussevitzky (Set 941, $2.63). On the records, however, this playing is reproduced not only without the magnificence of sound that one gets from the "Manfred" records, but without cleanness even in the sound one does get. The surfaces are poor, and two sides waver in pitch.

If, as someone insisted, it was I who called Balanchine's "Wanderer" "cosmic nonsense" when the American Ballet gave it, then I thought up a characterization of it which I cannot improve now after seeing the Ballet Theater's performance.

"The Specter of the Rose" has a sense which was destroyed, in the Ballet Theater's performance, by Eglevsky in the title role. For one thing he has a type of full-blown physical handsomeness which fits him for some other roles but which I would not pick to create the illusion of an incorporeal specter; nor was the illusion created, as it might have been nevertheless, by his movements. One marveled at the way the bulk was made to whirl on the ground and to soar or spin in the air, when one should have marveled at the apparent absence of any bulk at all. And worst of all was the fact that instead of a continuous outflow of emotion translated into a continuous line of movement in which each turn or leap was a mere point, there was a cessation of impulse as the body was placed in position for a series of turns, then the momentary release of impulse for the breath-taking execution of the unbelievable number of turns, then the cessation of impulse and breaking of line of pose and movement as the body was moved to another spot and placed in position for the next piece of technical brilliance, and so on. Svetlova danced beautifully.

As it happened, "The Specter of the Rose" was performed between "Aleko" and "Capriccio Espagnol," in each of which there was an exciting demonstration of continuity in movement by Lazovsky. With a non-professional eye I have tried to discover in Markova's dancing what produces its unique effect; and I have found it to be—for myself, at any rate—the emotional quality of the pattern of her body in one of those poses (analogous to the quality of the pattern of a tree in a Cézanne water-color)—the pattern completed at one end by the line of leg, of toe, at the other end by the line of arm, hand, fingers. It is the quality not only of the pattern at the end of a movement, but of the series of transitional patterns from the beginning of the movement to its end—which is to say that it is also the quality of the movement itself, created by its initial rate, its acceleration, its slowing down; and Markova's dancing is a continuous flow of such movement creating such patterns. So with Lazovsky: watch him in the third scene of "Aleko," the finale of "Capriccio Espagnol," and you will see a continuous moving pattern being created, with arms continuing the line of movement of torso, and hands completing the line of movement of arms—a pattern made exciting in this case by its incisive rhythmic quality. I am not contending that Lazovsky is as great a dancer as Markova, but only pointing out that what she does he also does in sufficient degree to make him the Ballet Theater's outstanding male dancer outside of Massine. These two dancing together in "Capriccio Espagnol"—with Massine opposing his great presence and style to Lazovsky's sheer incandescence of rhythmical agility—are a marvelous spectacle.

The Ballet Theater now has a number of excellent works in its repertory that are superbly danced; it has a few which it and the public would be better off without. It would do well to drop "The Wanderer," "Helen of Troy," and a few others, and to give "Bluebeard" fewer times; and in any case it should stop its practice of putting one ballet like "Bluebeard" or "Helen of Troy" on almost every program, so that a person has to see the several times in order to see the other things once. In adding to its repertory it would do well to produce the ballets which Balanchine created to concertos of Bach, Mozart, and Tchaikovsky. And above all, when it produces a ballet with excellent dancers, excellent scenery and costumes, it should not have the music performed with an insufficiently rehearsed scratch orchestra.

Art Note

PAINTINGS BY FORAIN. At the Coordinating Council of French Relief Societies, 457 Madison Avenue, until June 7.

This collection of Forain's paintings was assembled with some difficulty, the larger portion of his work being in France. However, there are enough here to show what a great painter he is. Ala Story says in the foreword, "As a deeply rooted human being he understood life in its entirety, and as the artist he responded to tragedy, mystery, and comedy. It is convincing truth in Forain's art which does not question but reveals a world which, even though we may not have experienced it before, seems familiar." This applies to all the paintings but is especially true of the courtroom scenes and of those depicting opera or cabaret, experts at work, and the life of the artist. At this exhibition one recaptures for a moment the beauty, harmony, and wit which France stands for.

Last Chance

Dear Sirs: Ely Culbertson's retort to Louis Fischer in your issue of May 22 was delightful. It is time more blueprints on the "shape of things to come" were analyzed in detail. That of Governor Stassen, for example, is much less complicated than Culbertson's. Why we need eleven or any "regional" federations in a world in which aircraft companies advertise that "no place on earth is more than sixty-four hours from your local airport" is difficult to understand.

Why Culbertson misses this particular argument against "regional federations" I do not know, especially as he hit the nail squarely on the head in his article by declaring that "liberal and socialistic formulas do not suffice" because the "something that is happening is specifically the revolution in communications and in the nature of military weapons."

As for the "nature of military weapons," I might add that atomic power is almost certain to be used in any third world war which we are stupid enough to permit. There would be enough energy in a single uranium-235 bomb to erase a city like London or New York completely from the map. Compared with the 4.5 trillion calories per gram-atomic of uranium 235, the arguments of our so-called "spiritual leaders" for organizing a "Commonwealth of Man" seem puerile. "Time's a wastin'," to quote ineffable Snuffy Smith. Why fool around with "regional" federations? If we're not ready to go "whole hog or none" now, Homo sapiens may never have another chance.

Error on Error

Dear Sirs: I find a curious error on page 651 in your issue of May 8, 1943. "For example," you say, "the 'Radek trial' of January, 1936, and the 'Bukharin trial' of March, 1936, are telescoped into one, . . ."

Radek, Bukharin, and Tukhachevsky were all tried separately in 1937. There was one purge trial in 1936, the trial of Zinoviev, Kamenev, and co-defendants in the fall of 1936. As a reporter I covered this trial for the International News Service.

And I might say that Bukharin made a public appearance as a free man in November, 1936, at the reception on November 7 at the home of the then Foreign Minister, now ambassador to the United States, Litvinov.

We lined up and shook hands with Bukharin. He looked pale, thin, and worried. All of us, the Moscow correspondents, had been trying to hint in our dispatches that he would be the next to be arrested, for his name had been mentioned during the Zinoviev-Kamenev trial. Now, here he was in the flesh. And nobody dared ask the shrinking fellow how long he would continue to be editor of Izvestia.

Ideals and Facts

Dear Sirs: Every man and woman, and many children, are doing their best to help their country obtain victory at the earliest possible time. Many of us are concerned with seeing a new type of society arise out of the conflict we are now engaged in, a society based on democratic ideals, tolerance, and world cooperation. There are those of us who will live to witness a new society, but many will have died to make it possible.

We hope that the principles of the Atlantic Charter will be broadened to include not only the countries of North and South America and Europe but those of Asia and Africa, and our enemies as well as our allies; that India as well as China will be free from imperialistic domination, to which they have been subjected for centuries.

We still have, and believe in, our ideals. We have been asked to do this job and we will not quit until it is finished. But we are puzzled by the "reasons" given us as to why we are fighting. They say it is for the rights of individuals to be free to pursue the quest for happiness. They say we are fighting to have equality for all individuals, regardless of race, color, or nationality, that we fight against the fallacy of race and national superiority. And yet we witness the army's segregation of individuals because of differences in the color of their skin.

Advancement for men with ability is announced to soldiers, and to the public. Men are urged to apply for Officers' Candidate School. However it is not publicized that men do not enter O. C. S. on a basis of equality. Soldiers who speak with a foreign accent are "advised" by their company commander "diplomatically" to resign at once from the school, as there would be very little point in their completing the course. Is this equality for all individuals? Or is it sowing the seed for the next war?

Mr. Fry Objects

Dear Sirs: In your issue of May 15 Alvarez del Vayo refers to an article which I published in The Nation last year and which you called Our Consuls at Work. He concludes that "most of them sympathized with Vichy and with Franco. Most of them were ready to stamp any anti-fascist fighter as an outlaw on the pay roll of Moscow."

As I did not draw any conclusions in the article myself, but confined myself to reporting what I had seen, Mr. del Vayo is entitled to draw his own conclusions from the evidence I presented. But I should not like to leave it to be assumed that his conclusions are mine.

I found all kinds of men among our consuls abroad, just as one finds all kinds of men among government employees at home. If I were to make any generalization about them, I should say that many of them seemed to know a good deal less about the countries they were working in than they ought to have known. A few of them, a very few, were outspokenly anti-Semitic. Some seemed to have difficulty distinguishing a Socialist from a Communist. Few knew much if anything about the European labor movement. Some of them seemed hostile to all immigration and particularly the immigration of anti-fascists.

But I could not say myself that most of them sympathized with Vichy and Franco and were ready to stamp any anti-fascist fighter as an outlaw on the pay roll of Moscow. I think it would be doing them a grave injustice to make such sweeping generalizations about them.

The Shape of Things

THE TAX BILL VOTED BY CONGRESS AFTER months of wrangling can best be described as Rum and water, but with the dilution no more than 25 per cent it makes a pretty intoxicating drink for the upper brackets. As Representative Dingell pointed out in the final debate, it means for the big taxpayers "an outright and irretrievable bonus, the equivalent of all the tax increases we have imposed on them in the past five years." It is the small taxpayers that will suffer the hangover, for when Congress turns to the question of raising additional revenue it will find that it cannot increase tax rates in the upper brackets by more than 1 or 2 per cent and will have to collect the necessary billions by doubling and trebling the rates in the lower brackets. Taken in the near future, this step might well prove political dynamite, and a Congressional agreement to postpone consideration of changes in income-tax rates until next year is significant. But additional revenue must be obtained somehow, and sales-tax propaganda is again being heard. For while the sales tax also falls with excessive weight on small incomes, its burden is not so immediately noticeable, or so politically dangerous, as that of an increase in income tax. Meanwhile, the Treasury has pointed out that corporation profits are expanding again and might well be subjected to higher normal tax rates. Aggregate net income of corporations for the current year is estimated at $25 billion compared with $19.5 billion last year and $9.4 billion in 1940, while net income after taxes is expected to exceed that of the banner year 1941. Although we are hearing many wails about the disastrous impact of taxes on corporation finances, it would seem that we have still some way to go before "taking the profits out of war."

THE WORST WE CAN SAY OF JOHN L. LEWIS is that he deserves the compliments paid him by the Völkischer Beobachter on June 4. His attitude is best described in the terms he himself hurled at the War Labor Board. "Self-importance . . . jealous and vindictive . . . place their own vanity above the national interest . . . piously arrogant . . . pompous and capricious . . . seduced by their own egotism"—these phrases from Lewis's latest salvo at the WLB are an unerring, if unconscious, self-portrait. At the President's orders Lewis has instructed the miners to return to work, but with a new deadline of June 20. That he will win a considerable victory for the miners before that date is clear. For he and the operators were reported only 50 cents apart on the portal-to-portal pay issue, and his greatest ally in hastening a settlement is the retroactive feature of the pending agreement. The government has promised higher coal prices to make up for any pay increase, and the longer the operators delay the more that retroactive feature will cost them. They cannot charge the government for coal they did not mine. But Lewis and his miners, and the labor movement as a whole, will suffer irreparable damage from a strike which was irresponsible and unpatriotic and unjustified, no matter what the miners' grievances.

BURLINGAME

✱

THE STRIKE COST THE COUNTRY A LOSS OF 2,000,000 tons of coal a day and the shutting down of more than a dozen steel blast furnaces dependent on this coal. It has disgraced labor in the eyes of our fighting men and given the right a powerful weapon in its campaign to stir anti-labor feelings in the army and navy. In Congress the strike led to the passage of a drastic bill for the control of labor and strikes by a majority so large as to make a veto by the President politically difficult. The original Connally bill, as passed by the Senate, was unpalatable enough to labor. The version as rewritten on the House floor and jammed through by a coalition of Republicans and Southern Democrats is virtually the old Smith bill, which was killed in the Senate after Pearl Harbor. Some of its worst features—notably the anti-closed-shop and labor-injunction clauses—were struck out at Smith's own motion. But what remains is still one of the most drastic pieces of anti-labor legislation to be passed by Congress in many years. The President should veto the bill. Labor in general has been extraordinarily successful in maintaining its anti-strike pledge, and the passage in haste and high feeling of such far-reaching legislation is nothing short of reckless.

ALL THAT MARS THE PERFECT HARMONY OF the Republican Party is the question of what the world should be like after the war. The world has not been a major consideration in Republican politics for some years, and it might have been by-passed once more if a group of pro-Willkie fanatics had not forced things by organizing what they call a Post-War Policy Association—and what the Chicago Tribune calls "Betrayal, Inc." The association is committed to a block-to-block, farm-to-farm campaign to line up delegates pledged to the Ball-Burton-Hatch-Hill resolution, to a post-war international council based on the United Nations, and to the defeat of the party's isolationists, who, according to the association's leader, now mask as "super-patriots" and "nationalists." Confronted with the issue in this ugly way, the Republican National Committee has taken steps to keep the quarrel in the family. A Council of Forty-nine has been set up to make a dispassionate study and to bring to next summer's convention a report which, it is hoped, will be quietly accepted as the conclusive findings of the party experts on post-war worlds. Absent from this official advisory council are Wendell Willkie, who wrote of "One World," Senators Ball and Burton, co-authors of the famous resolution, William Allen White and Governor Stassen, and other famous Republicans whose minds carry beyond the barriers of ocean. Among the Forty-niners, on the other hand, are Senators Taft and Vandenberg, Joe Martin, Clarence Budington Kelland, and many more who, even according to the Republican New York Herald Tribune, "can only see as far ahead as the ends of their noses on a very clear day." We could have told Committee Chairman Spangler that his hope of undermining the maverick Post-War Policy Association would have been better served by burying its leaders in his advisory council. But fortunately we were not asked.

THE BULK OF EDESEL FORD'S HOLDINGS IN the Ford Motor Company have been bequeathed to the Ford Foundation, an institution for the promotion of "scientific, educational, and charitable purposes," and eventually his father's shares are likely to find the same resting place. Is this a generous gesture or a device for dodging taxes and perpetuating the Ford family's industrial power? Fairly clearly it is the latter, for if estate and inheritance taxes were paid on the whole Ford fortune it would be reduced by at least 75 per cent. The family would still be comfortably situated as regards income, but a majority of the Ford holdings would probably have to be liquidated to satisfy the demands of the Treasury. By turning over the majority of its stock to the foundation, however, and by sacrificing income, the family can retain power over the industrial empire indefinitely. This delightfully simple solution to the multi-millionaire's great problem is made possible by the exemption from all estate duties of bequests for "the public welfare." In the case of the Edsel Ford fortune it means that a mere $12,000,000 or so will be paid to the Treasury instead of upward of $150,000,000 if the whole had been subject to inheritance taxes. The Fords are not the only rich men to take advantage of a legal loophole which Congress ought to close in the next revenue bill. Income-tax payers can claim exemption for gifts to charity only to the extent of 15 per cent of their taxable income. Perhaps tax-free bequests should be limited to the same extent. But in any case exemption should be refused in cases where the beneficiary is an organization controlled by the family of the donor.

THE CHINESE ADVANCE SOUTH OF ICHANG has turned out to be one of the most decisive victories of the six-year-old war. Chiang Kai-shek's troops have not only retaken a considerable part of the territory lost as a result of the powerful Japanese offensive, but are now presenting a formidable threat to Ichang itself. While it seems unlikely that the Chinese army will be able to advance much farther at this time, its success suggests immense possibilities once the Chinese are given adequate air support. All the Japanese victories in the past have been won with the advantage of overwhelming air superiority. The Ichang battle was the first in which the Chinese had control of the skies, and their ability to storm strongly fortified Japanese defenses under an air umbrella suggests that the airplane may be even more decisive in Far Eastern fighting than it was in Tunisia. The effectiveness of a few dozen planes in turning the tide of a major Japanese offensive should convince even the most hard-boiled "realist" of the desirability of giving Chinese needs a higher priority than has been assigned them in the past. General Chenault's satisfaction with the decisions recently made in Washington suggests that more aid will be forthcoming soon.

The Meaning of Algiers

BY FRED A. KIRCHWEY

PEOPLE are saying that France was reborn in Algiers last week. Some are even suggesting that American and British officials in North Africa served as midwives skilfully assisting in a dangerous and painful delivery.

Neither statement is true. France was never dead. It lived on from the hour of defeat and surrender in the tough, courageous resistance of the Fighting French forces organized under General de Gaulle and in the underground, carrying out in the very teeth of the Nazi occupation a growing program of sabotage and political organization. It survived in even more effective form when these patriotic elements joined forces, when the Fighting French office in London was augmented by escaped leaders of the resistance inside France and became in fact as well as name a National Committee. Before the first American soldier set foot on an African beach, a large part of the French Empire was enlisted under the leadership of De Gaulle and administered according to the laws of the republic. In spite of immense obstacles, not the least of which was the policy pursued in Washington, fighting France was already a going concern.

The hostility of the United States government to De Gaulle has been variously explained. Walter Lippmann charitably attributes it to the "error of our diplomatic agents in failing to understand and therefore to report correctly to the State Department and to the White House the dominating and ascending importance of the national movement which has rallied around General Charles de Gaulle." Others, of more psychological turn of mind, have interpreted our behavior as a defense mechanism resulting from our equivocal relations with Vichy: De Gaulle became the very personification of our national sense of guilt. Both explanations are plausible. Both are humiliating. But even taken together they fail to take account of the powerful current of political reaction in the State Department. To those men who hope to stave off revolution in Europe by piling sandbags around all the crumbling symbols of "authority," De Gaulle has represented the threat of popular control. They resist him not because they are unaware of the "dominating and ascending importance" of his following, but because they are aware and afraid of it.

Why did our representatives in North Africa succeed in postponing, time after time, from the first of January until the end of May, the visit of De Gaulle to Algiers? Why, when the visit was finally agreed upon, did they, with Giraud, try to arrange the meeting in some obscure spot outside the capital? Was it because they were unaware of De Gaulle's popularity? Or was it because they knew that the great tide of support which had risen around his name and the cause of Fighting France would overwhelm the political dykes set up by our own authorities and the men they had placed or maintained in power during the North African operations? The answer is clear enough. They were afraid of the popularity of De Gaulle even in Algiers. They knew that his arrival in North Africa would cause difficulties—not merely, as they like to pretend, because De Gaulle himself is "difficult," but because his stubborn insistence on a civilian authority representing all the genuine elements of French resistance meant the final end of America's Vichy policy.

No, it is too late for the State Department to claim that the creation of the National Committee of Liberation took place either under our aegis or according to our wishes. The very tone of the dispatches, the comments of officials, prove the contrary. What impatience was betrayed when the conferees took three full days to arrive at an understanding! (Was this really so long a time to devote to the creation of a de facto government for the French Empire?) And when it became clear that De Gaulle was proving stubborn about the Vichy holdovers in high office, what bland refusal to acknowledge that a purge of the worst collaborationists was the bare minimum he could demand and still keep the confidence of the French masses!

Luckily the French leader is difficult and stubborn. And as a result, Noguès, Peyrouton, Lemaigre-Dubreuil, Mendigal, and Bergeret have all been swept out of office. Others are scheduled to go. And the Committee of Liberation itself, although not free of questionable members—especially the newly arrived five-star general, Alphonse-Joseph Georges—is moderately promising. The compromises De Gaulle has doubtless felt forced to make offer no fatal obstacle to a vigorous policy in support of the war and a rapid liquidation of the remnants of Vichy rule in Africa. But he will have to watch both his new colleagues and his allies.

It is probable that the Committee of National Liberation can survive its inner conflicts if the British and Americans accept without qualification the independence and sovereignty of the new body, give it prompt diplomatic recognition and representation in the Allied war councils, and regard with patience and decent respect the difficulties it still faces. To do this the United States will have to abandon both its past policy and its recent practice. From now on France will mold its own future. The demonstration of popular support in Algiers gave De Gaulle more power than the backing of American arms and diplomacy could give Giraud. If our government can find the humility to accept and understand this fact, the bitter political struggle in North Africa will have been worth while.

For the thing we should have learned in Algiers is the encouraging truth that the French people are still a force to be reckoned with—that no political arrangements made in defiance or disregard of their will are going to hold. And if this has proved true in North Africa, how much more clearly will it be demonstrated in Continental France, where organized resistance and the spirit of revolt are developed to a degree that is impossible to achieve under the conditions existing in North Africa.

It must be remembered by our leaders, military and political, that North Africa is not an end. It is hardly a beginning. Europe comes next. And in every country awaiting liberation lie political pitfalls into which our feet will surely stumble if the lesson of Algiers has not been learned. Not only will our Darlans be assassinated; not only will our Girauds be regarded with watchful skepticism; but even our most benevolent arrangements for the guidance and orderly development of the countries we "free" will be promptly overthrown unless they represent the will of the men and women who have risked their lives for their own freedom.

This urgent lesson was clearly expounded in the speech by General de Gaulle last Sunday. Let us hope it has penetrated the smug confines of the Department of State. Let us hope, too, that it was read aloud in the more enlightened classrooms of the School of Military Government at Charlottesville. It is the most important piece of political equipment our "military administrators" should carry with them on their coming foreign assignments.

The New Wagner Bill

AS A first step toward the better America that we tell ourselves must emerge from this war, Senators Wagner and Murray, together with Representative Dingell of Michigan, last week introduced a bill into Congress embodying an "American Beveridge plan." The bill, which is without question the most significant measure to come before this session of Congress, is more than a legislative version of the now celebrated National Resources Planning Board Report. Like the original Beveridge plan it envisions a single, comprehensive program providing protection against financial loss resulting from unemployment, sickness, disability, old age, widowhood, and death. It goes beyond the recommendations of the NRPB and the Social Security Board in setting forth a concrete plan for medical and hospital insurance and in providing full social-security protection to the members of the armed forces upon demobilization.

In other particulars the new Wagner bill closely follows the NRPB recommendations. It would set up a single, national system of insurance replacing the cumbersome federal-state unemployment-compensation system. It would extend the payment of unemployment benefits to twenty-six, or possibly fifty-two, weeks instead of the fifteen or sixteen weeks now in force. It would provide dependents' allowances for the unemployed so that the children in large families will not be discriminated against. It would extend the protection of old-age insurance to some 15,000,000 persons not now protected, including farm workers, domestic servants, employees of non-profit organizations, independent farmers, small business men, and professional men. It would provide protection against temporary or permanent disability.

There are actually but three important types of protection provided in the original Beveridge plan that are not included in the Wagner bill. All these omissions are unfortunate, but they probably can be explained by lack of preparatory studies by the NRPB or the Social Security Board. The first is the failure to provide for the costs of dental care along with those of medical care. The experience of Selective Service authorities fully bears out earlier investigations in the schools which revealed that a majority of American children have defective teeth largely because of inability to meet the costs of adequate dental care. Second, the Wagner bill omits coverage of the unusual costs of maternity care. Nearly all other industrial countries have found it desirable to make sure that its children had an opportunity to be born under as healthful conditions as possible. Even more distressing is the failure of the bill to provide a system of children's allowances such as Beveridge has proposed for England. Basically, no other phase of social security is more important. For as Sir William never tires of pointing out, such allowances are an essential outgrowth of the democratic faith.

In contrast to the Beveridge plan, Senator Wagner would finance his program primarily by direct taxation on the persons who presumably will derive the greatest benefits from security. To this end he proposes that the existing pay-roll tax on employers and employees be raised to a total of 12 per cent. Since the amount of money collected under such a tax would be several billion dollars a year more than would be needed to pay immediate benefits, his plan is actually a sort of forced-savings program to help pay for the war. These savings would be paid back after the war in social-security benefits instead of cash. Senator Wagner himself attaches great importance to this aspect of his program. Politically, it doubtless represents sound strategy, since it should attract support from the groups that are seeking to place the financial burden of the war on the low income groups. But the tax and security programs do not necessarily have to go together, and it would be wise for the National Resources Planning Board, the Treasury, or some other federal agency to make a careful investigation of the financial capacities of low-income families before a regressive tax of this size is imposed. Even such a comprehensive program as Senator Wagner's can be supported by a considerably lower tax rate than that suggested.

Argentina's Fake Revolt

THE quick success of last week's revolt in Argentina was equaled only by the speed of its unmasking. Confused as were the motives behind the military upset, it was perfectly clear that the generals who during the first forty-eight hours replaced Ramón Castillo were at least as reactionary as he. Their initial moves were conclusive. They chose as the only civil members of the new Cabinet two well-known rightists. One of them, the Finance Minister, José María Rosa, is not only a reactionary but a declared enemy of the United Nations. They made no effort to obtain, even for the sake of appearances, the collaboration of distinguished conservatives like Señor Cantilo, the former Foreign Minister, or of moderate liberals like Señor Saavedra Lamas, rector of the University of Buenos Aires—both uncompromising opponents of Hitlerism. The Cabinet dissolved Congress, the bulwark of the fight for the end of pro-Nazi neutrality. It suppressed La Hora, a near-Communist newspaper, and one favoring a new attitude toward the Allies. It did not touch Pampero and Cabildo, which continue their abuse of the United Nations and their pro-German propaganda.

By their total lack of caution in exposing the political color of the new government, the generals sealed their own fate. The Argentine public, at first jubilant at the overthrow of Castillo, reacted quickly. Resentment at the character of the Cabinet forced its replacement overnight. This is encouraging because it shows that opinion still has power in Argentina. But it must be admitted that the new government, headed by General Pedro Pablo Ramirez and made up entirely of military men, offers small other grounds for optimism. Ramirez drew the lesson from the fate of his predecessor and proclaimed democracy from the balcony of the Casa Rosada. He also pledged friendship to the other American republics and neutrality "for the present" toward the rest of the world. This was obviously the least he could offer. Optimistic diplomats point to the qualifying words "for the present" as offering hope that Argentina may now swing into line with the rest of the hemisphere. In internal policy the new men have so far made no move to undo the work of the first Cabinet.

The whole sequence of events, however, has demonstrated how weak was the foundation on which the Castillo regime rested and how easy it would have been for the United Nations to help the Argentine people establish a democratic government. It is no longer a secret that more than a year ago an important Argentine parliamentary delegation arrived in the United States at the invitation of our government. Among the delegates were some of the chief elements of the opposition. The delegation was very exact in foreseeing the developments that have since taken place. And it formally recommended a policy of support for the democratic forces in Argentina which favored collaboration with the United States.

Some modest gestures were made in that direction. Sumner Welles addressed a solemn warning to the Castillo government. Argentina was pointedly omitted from the list of nations participating in the food conference at Hot Springs. But those were only half measures. What was necessary was an honest recognition that only a daring policy of collaboration—material as well as moral—with the democrats of Argentina could meet the demands of the hour. Such a policy would have led to quite different results from the ones we are witnessing today. Instead of seeing Castillo replaced by a bunch of reactionary generals, with no clear orientation in the foreign field, we could have had in power a democratic government, bringing to the war effort and to the preparation of the peace the important contribution of the leading South American country.

It is difficult, in the midst of change and confusion, to predict immediate developments or to suggest a definite line of policy. One thing remains unchanged—the strong desire of the Argentine people to see democracy win within the country and to see Argentina finally incorporated in the inter-American front. That desire gives the United Nations, and especially Washington, strong grounds for refusing recognition to any regime that does not offer a constitutional, democratic set-up.

Esso Family Reunion

BY I. F. STONE

Flemington, N. J., June 1

LUNCHEON for the stockholders of the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey was served on the first floor of the Patrons of Husbandry Hall by the good ladies of the Grandview Grange, and in the dining-room of the Union Hotel. This ancient hotel might have provided a scene in Dickens's "American Notes." The wall panels, hand-painted by local talent, depict Thomas Jefferson, Washington Crossing the Delaware, the Barefoot Boy, and two Indian squaws husking corn. The squaws look like Anglo-Saxon middle-class matrons and carry themselves with the hauteur of Daughters of the American Revolution.

Outside the hotel, on the broad veranda, was a sizable collection of local citizens gathered for the town's one great annual event; this, the seat of Hunterdon County, being otherwise distinguished only for the trial of the Lindbergh kidnapper. The stockholders' meeting was held in the second-floor loft of the whitewashed Patrons of Husbandry building nearby. During the proceedings a rooster in the neighborhood interjected from time to time a friendly cock-a-doodle-doo. The company claque, as obvious as an Italian opera star's, seemed to think it an uproarious joke whenever a cock crow interrupted a minority stockholder's speech, though the rooster was otherwise accepted quietly as part of the meeting's Old Home Week décor.

The setting seemed designed to give the Standard Oil Company an Early American flavor. The sterner note befitting our times was also struck. Two survivors of torpedoed Standard Oil tankers, one a shy young Bostonian, the other a Swedish boatswain, were introduced, and told of their experiences with quiet understatement. "They happened to be in town," Ralph W. Gallagher, president of Standard Oil, explained, "and I just couldn't resist the temptation to ask them to come over and talk to us." The temptation was understandable. Later, when the company's cartel relations with I. G. Farben were attacked by minority spokesmen, an indignant stockholder jumped up to point at the two seamen and ask how anyone could question the patriotism of a company which had given the lives of three hundred of its men in the war against the submarine. At this point your correspondent was taken ill.

The stockholders looked like a gathering of Grant Wood faces. They seemed to stem largely from what might be termed the Lumpenbourgeoisie; most of them elderly folk, some a little threadbare. They seemed the kind of good people who have retired on meager incomes from hard-saved earnings, and apparently regarded the meeting, with its free ride to bucolic Flemington and its free lunch, as a pleasant annual junket. Among them, conspicuous in the discussions, in which few took part, were a small group of stockholders unable to restrain their indignant loyalty to the company. This handful was curiously self-possessed under circumstances which would make the ordinary person nervous; they seemed accustomed to facing an audience, and I had a feeling that several of them might well be "bit" actors from Broadway—they looked their parts so well.

There was the Brooklynite who jumped up to shout "we hoid all dis before" when William Floyd II, leader of a little minority band, asked the company to promise that it would not resume its cartel with I. G. Farben after the war. There was the Jewish lady, with a nose so large as to cast doubt upon its authenticity, who might have stepped out of a comedy role in a burlesque circuit. She rose to testify to her faith in management, with lowly simplicity and a Brownsville (New York, not Texas) accent. There was the Retired Major, who asked whether the company couldn't save a little by getting a new auditing firm, and then hastened to answer his own question by suggesting that after all he supposed it cost quite a bit to audit the accounts of a company whose operations extended "the world over." There was that hardy perennial of Standard Oil meetings, former Ambassador Gerard, who reassured the stockholders from his personal observations in Germany and expressed his annual confidence in the management. Much was made of Gerard's testimony by another loyal stockholder, from whose remarks one would hardly have gathered that Gerard left the Reich ten years before I. G. Farben was formed.

The whopper of the meeting was Gallagher's unblushing statement, "We never had any cartel agreement with I. G. Farbenindustrie. What we did do was to buy from I. G. Farben some patent rights and part interest in inventions." The italics are his. This is a bald falsehood, as anyone can see for himself who reads the Standard-I. G. agreements reprinted in Part 6 of the Bone patents committee hearings or Part 11 of the Truman committee's. The agreements pledged the two giant firms not to muscle in on each other's markets and sought to divide the world between them. The heart of the cartel was the division-of-fields agreement of November 9, 1929, which can be found in either volume.

A committee of five minority stockholders with 744 shares among them managed miraculously to roll up 228,759 share votes for a resolution which would have pledged the management not to resume its cartel with I. G. Farben after the war. Floyd, the head of this committee, and Amos C. Basel, its counsel, were jeered and heckled as they spoke. ("It's like a scene from Ibsen's 'Enemy of the People,'" whispered their chief supporter, Mrs. Florence K. Mixer.) Gallagher had personally solicited proxies against the resolution, and obtained 17,396,705 votes from the 24,000,000 shares of common it has outstanding. Gallagher, having denied there ever was a cartel, said the resolution posed a "will you stop beating your wife?" question. The company's objection to accepting the resolution, as Alfred Baker Lewis suggested from the floor, seemed to be that it did not want its hands tied in case it decided to "beat its wife" in the future.

Little more than a year has passed since the revelations in Washington on the part played by the Standard-I. G. Farben cartel in delaying the development of both synthetic rubber and aviation gas in this country. The full effects of this powerful weapon of economic warfare in the hands of the Hitler government will be felt this fall, when the rubber shortage will reach its peak. Yet after a persistent and nation-wide campaign of misstatement and misrepresentation, Standard Oil felt strong enough to fight an anti-cartel resolution publicly and was strong enough to get away with it. The stockholders' vote will some day be used as though it were an authorization to resume the cartel, unless the people of Germany after the war decide to make that impossible by sweeping away I. G. Farben as well as Hitler.

I hope soon, in another letter, to discuss the "free" patents offer with which Standard Oil hopes to make sure that the cartel, when revived, will control the rubber industry of our country. I note now only that there was a completely unorganized protest vote of 37,609 shares against that offer and that Basel forced E. F. Johnson, Standard Oil's general counsel, to admit at the meeting that the Alien Property Custodian had taken over as enemy-owned the rubber patents which Standard is offering free to the rubber industry. "Free," that is, with enough hidden strings attached to give Standard control of the industry and enable it to charge royalties on these same "free" patents.

Mexico's "Social Justice" Party

BY BETTY KIRK

ON NOVEMBER 30, 1942, all members of the Mexican Chamber of Deputies and the Senate signed the constitution of the National Anti-Nazi, Anti-Fascist Committee, an organization made up of Congressmen and civic leaders to fight the fifth column in Mexico. One article in the constitution says: "Given the documentary proof which we possess, we consider Sinarquismo and other organizations affiliated with it a fifth column which follows in Mexico the lead of the Falange Española and uses Nazi-Fascist tactics. Their activities are a threat to our nation and are systematically opposed to good relations between our country and other democracies."

This official statement puts the finger on the source of the growing anti-United States propaganda in Mexico today. Such propaganda is more widespread than it was when Pearl Harbor was attacked and has been growing rapidly since Mexico went to war.

Yet for more than a year a campaign has been under way in the United States to whitewash the Sinarquista movement, to sell it to the public, and to promote a similar fifth column in the United States. The whitewash campaign was given sound effects this spring when Sinarquista intellectuals began lecture tours in this country, wrote letters to our newspapers misrepresenting the facts of the movement, and received enthusiastic support from their sympathizers here. Not content with this intellectual infiltration, the Sinarquistas and their supporters are smearing every writer or publication that dares to expose their subversive character and totalitarian program.

The battle cry of the Sinarquistas is "social justice." It was therefore appropriate that Father Charles Coughlin should be their first sponsor here. In his Social Justice of September 22, 1941, he published a defense of the movement which ended: "Advocates of Christian Social Justice in America, Christian Americans who once dreamed of a national union to effect a sixteen-point reform and who have watched the progress of the Christian states headed by Salazar, De Valera, General Franco, and Mussolini, will want to hear further from Mexico's Sinarquistas with their sixteen principles of Social Justice." Father Coughlin's Social Justice has since been suspended as subversive literature by Attorney General Biddle.

The next sales talk on Sinarquismo appeared in the Tablet, published by Father Jerome Holland of Brooklyn, in its issue of November 8, 1941. On April 18, 1942, America, published by the Society of Jesus, took up the cudgels for the Mexican movement. The Sign for November, 1942, brought forth an article of the same character, which was reprinted in the Catholic Digest of December, 1942. The West Coast was heard from in February, 1943, when Mt. Angel College in Oregon issued a pamphlet called "Sinarchism—the Hope of Mexico's Poor." On April 18, 1943, the National Catholic Rural Life Conference issued a publicity release whitewashing the Sinarquistas, and on May 8, 1943, Father Holland, fresh from a trip to Mexico, published the Sinarquistas' sixteen-point program. In the same issue the Brooklyn priest defended the Franco regime.

It is time that the people of the United States—particularly loyal, democratic Catholics who support our war effort and are not Coughlinites—understood how they are being hoodwinked. The best way to unmask the Sinarquistas is to quote from their own publications. But first it is essential to see who they are.

SINARQUISMO IS BORN

Five men met in the city of León, Guanajuato, on May 23, 1937, to organize the National Sinarquista Union. It was the year in which the Falange Española was organized in Mexico and Father Coughlin's Christian Front began to operate in the United States. The original members of Sinarquismo were José Trueba Olivares, José Antonio Urquiza, Manuel Zermeño, Ruben Mendoza, and Francisco Ornelas. They were all Jesuit-trained aristocrats and intellectuals.

The five original members were joined by fifteen organizers, young intellectuals who canvassed the country for recruits, using methods best described as "a Franciscan program and Jesuit tactics." Each went among the poor like the friars of old, eating their bread, sharing their roof, and organized in every humble village a cell of five. Each member of this cell recruited another five, each of the twenty-five enlisted five more, and so on. In six years they built up an organization of 700,000 adult male members. If each man has a family of five, 3,500,000 persons are dedicated to the cause out of a total population of less than 20,000,000.

The movement is directed by a national committee which appoints and governs regional committees. These in turn appoint and govern municipal committees which have rural subcommittees under them. It is a hierarchic system, appointive from top to bottom, the perfect pattern of the corporate state. Elections are unknown.

The directors are aristocratic intellectuals, many of them members of the old hacendado class, masquerading as popular leaders. The membership is made up almost entirely of Indian peasants, illiterate and devout. The members are called "soldiers"; their recruiting is a "conquest." They are organized in military formations and given military training, and they call their leaders "Chief." The members give a salute—of the right arm crossed over the chest, the hand extended above the opposite shoulder. They wear arm bands and carry a flag with a white circle on a red background; in the center of the circle is a green map of Mexico stamped with the letters P. N. S.—Partido Nacional Sinarquista. In this regalia they are led on marches about the country chanting, "Fe y Patria! Viva Cristo Rey!"—"Faith and Country! Long Live Christ the King!" It is the cry of the fanatic Cristeros who led a bloody civil war in Mexico in the twenties.

The Sinarquistas have a weekly newspaper, El Sinarquista, and a monthly magazine called Orden. Both talk of persecution and martyrdom and exhort the people to die to "save Mexico." They must "save" it from the Revolution, the Bolsheviks, the gringos, the Masons, Protestants, and Jews. Mexico will only be saved when it is restored to its traditional patterns. These were described in the anniversary issue of El Sinarquista for May 23, 1942, as "Catholic faith, Spanish traditions, home, village, hierarchy, Christian political order, common good."

The name comes from the Greek and means "With Order." The leaders call this order new, but it is really a very old system that they are working to restore.

SINARQUISMO AND THE REVOLUTION

Mexico's Revolution, which began in 1910, attempted to abolish domestic feudalism and foreign imperialism. In its thirty-two-year struggle it has gone a long way toward achieving both, and the term "Revolution" has become synonymous with "government." During this period governments have distributed more than 60,000,000 acres of land to the peasants, set up banks to finance its cultivation, formed and financed workers' co-operatives, organized labor unions, adopted minimum-wage and social-security laws, expropriated the rebellious foreign oil companies, established thousands of rural schools and dozens of technological schools, and guaranteed civil liberties, including freedom of worship. The Revolution is the greatest emancipating movement in the Americas. It is wholly dedicated to the welfare of the common man—the very Indian peasants whom the Sinarquistas are leading on a crusade to destroy this work.

The aim of the new crusade is to liquidate the Revolution and inaugurate the counter-revolution and its corporate state. In its issue of May 23, 1942, El Sinarquista printed this threat: "The Revolution has attempted to reform Mexico, but it has only deformed Mexico. . . . Sinarquismo is aggressively anti-Revolutionary." At about the same time the organization published a manifesto which said: "Sinarquismo considers that the Mexican Revolution is a process of vicious disintegration which began with our independence movement [against Spain] and has culminated in the Communist program of recent years. . . . Sinarquismo, which is only an instrument in the struggle of the new generations, proclaims that it will destroy the Revolution and restore the Christian order which the Revolution annihilated."

THE CHURCH IS SPLIT

The Sinarquistas insist that no member of the clergy can join their movement, that they have no connection with the church. Yet their slogans are "Faith and Country"; they will establish a "new Christian order." If they have no connection with the church, then they are asking us to believe in another virgin birth. Commenting upon the movement's exploitation of religion, the government newspaper El Nacional declared: "It is evident that the use of religious beliefs for the purpose of power politics and agitation is an abuse of the innocence and good faith of the believers, a prostitution of the true religious spirit, and a deliberate outrage against the most backward classes of the nation."

Mexico's liberal archbishop, Luis M. Martínez, has repeatedly denied that his church has any connection with the Sinarquistas. Indirectly he has tried to undermine their influence by twice calling on Mexican Catholics to support the government and the war "even against their consciences." Despite the Archbishop's instructions, "some members of the clergy" have been publicly accused by liberal spokesmen, government and labor newspapers, and government officials of "pro-Axis activities." The existing schism was first revealed in the spring of 1940 when Senator José Maria Davila, speaking over a national radio hook-up, said: "At present the Mexican clergy is divided into two groups: one is orthodox and conservative; the other, unfortunately small, is mildly Revolutionary . . . [and] works with the government. The Archbishop works with the latter group, and we Revolutionaries sympathize with him. Because of his attitude, some of the high clergy condemn the Archbishop as a liberal."

It is clear that there is an open split in the Catholic church in Mexico, just as there was in pre-war Europe. A parallel can be found in the United States in the difference between such liberals as the late Cardinal Mundelein and Father Coughlin.

SINARQUISMO CROSSES THE BORDER

At first Mexican citizenship was a requirement for membership in Sinarquismo, but after a few months this was changed to Mexican descent. It was changed so that the movement could infiltrate into Mexican communities in the United States. The process began with the establishment of the Southern California Regional Committee at Los Angeles on November 1, 1937. A year later a Regional Committee was organized at El Paso.

Today the Sinarquistas are registered with the Department of Justice as alien agents. The Los Angeles Regional Committee states in its registration that it has branches at Pacoima, San Fernando, San Bernardino, La Verne, Ontario, Watts, El Monte, Oxnard, Pomona, and Azusa. The El Paso group has registered cells at McAllen, Mission, and Laredo. Other cells are found in New Mexico, Arizona, Colorado, and Indiana. The total membership in the United States is given as only 2,000, but El Sinarquista has reported that the movement is growing rapidly. Alfonso Felix Diaz Escobar, a member of the Mexican Chamber of Deputies, has estimated that it has 50,000 adherents in the Los Angeles district alone, but this figure is considered too high in informed circles.

It should be enlightening to loyal Catholics here to read the Sinarquistas' own pronouncements on the subject of the United States and democracy. In May, 1941, they declared that their foreign policy was against pan-American solidarity and cooperation with the United States, against the atheism of the Soviet Union and the paganism of Nazi Germany, but for the socialistic programs of both these states. Its object, they said, was to create a bloc of Latin American nations to oppose the United States and follow Franco Spain. This frankness had such repercussions that the Sinarquista leaders began to hedge a bit, but on May 23, 1942, they reprinted a statement of policy which had appeared often before in the pages of El Sinarquista. It ran: "Sinarquismo struggles for the restoration of the Christian social order. Liberal democracy, as well as fascism and communism, is contrary to this order" (italics mine).

The current propaganda line is that "Sinarquismo is loyally endeavoring to cooperate with the attitude and point of view of the United States," but the document mentioned above, which was signed by all the members of the Mexican Congress, refutes this.

"WE SUPPORT THE WAR BUT . . ."

President Avila Camacho ended his declaration of war upon the Axis with the appeal, "Mexico expects every one of her sons to do his duty." The Sinarquistas answered with the statement, "We accept the President's decision with the respect it deserves. . . . [But] Sinarquismo warns that its adherence to the decisions made by the government will not stop it from fighting the Bolsheviks, who now more than ever are the gravest danger to the nation." (All labor and liberal government officials are called "Bolsheviks" by the Sinarquistas.) Manuel Torres Bueno, the organization's "Supreme Chief," wrote blandly in El Sinarquista, "The state of war may precipitate a civil war." Anti-war, anti-government, anti-United States propaganda is given out at Sinarquista meetings. Armed bands of Sinarquistas shot up conscripts training in two villages in Zacatecas.

A representative of the Anti-Nazi, Anti-Fascist Committee who attended a meeting held at Tepic, Nayarit, in January of this year testified in a signed report that membership in "the local Sinarquista organization was increasing and that the leaders were the same men who directed the Cristero revolt. He summed up the party line thus: (1) other states are already up in arms; (2) military instruction is being given Mexicans only so that the United States can use them as cannon fodder; (3) Germany, Italy, and Japan never injured Mexico but the gringos have always been enemies; (4) President Avila Camacho and Minister of Defense Cárdenas have sold out Mexico to the United States; (5) reports of the democracies' victories are lies, and the United States and England have already lost the war; (6) the sinking of the Mexican tankers which brought the country into war was done by the Yankees, not the Nazis; (7) all Sinarquistas should produce only enough food for their families, nothing for sale, as the gringos would get it and this would be treason to the country; (8) Sinarquistas are infiltrating into government offices in preparation for overthrowing the Avila Camacho regime.

A report of a meeting held in the same month at the village of San José, near El Paso, Texas, shows how closely integrated is their propaganda in the United States and Mexico. The San José Sinarquistas were told that Mexican farmers sent by their government to this country to relieve our labor shortage would be conscripted by the Yankees and used as cannon fodder; that the Sinarquistas have a "mission" to stop this; that Mexico owes nothing to the United States, which has always robbed it; and that the obligatory military service must be opposed by Sinarquistas. At a subsequent meeting this group was told to "combat the Yankee fifth column" but was warned that supervision of their movement in the United States had been transferred from the State Department to the FBI and all must be on their guard.

In cooperation with the Acción Nacional and the Partido Autonomista Mexicana, both blatantly Franquista groups, the Sinarquistas are responsible for the anti-"gringo" sentiment which is reaching the danger point in Mexico today.

THE GOALS OF SINARQUISMO

"On Your Guard, Mr. President" was the warning given by Senator David Ayala in the spring of 1942. "Surely," he wrote, "we don't suppose that the Sinarquista organization, which now has newspapers, hierarchic chiefs, and organized masses, has a divine objective. . . . This organization is human, with essentially political ends, and it is attempting to get hidden control of the Mexican government. There is in all this a similarity to the beginning of the totalitarian governments in Germany and Italy. . . . The Sinarquistas are in fact a fifth column, already so powerful that their presence is visible; they flaunt in public their increasing strength, and in a short time will make demands on you. Later, throughout the country, they will resort to unified action which will be difficult to suppress because Sinarquismo is undermining the Revolution at its roots . . ." (italics mine).

The sixteen-point program of the Sinarquistas issued in February, 1942, and reprinted in the Brooklyn Tablet of May 8, 1943, is a blueprint for this undermining process. Sinarquism seeks "the restoration in Mexico of the Christian social order. . . . No nation shall accept a social program contrary to its historical traditions. . . . Sinarquism is a social movement among the masses. . . . in accord with the cultural and religious traditions of Mexico." Such traditions are identified in all Sinarquista propaganda as Spanish, never as Indian, and all the great liberal heroes who fought to free the Indian are smeared as traitors.

It is stated in the program that the movement approves of land division so that every peasant can be a small property holder but that it will "protect property" too. It has "undertaken the gigantic task of rehabilitating the national agriculture"; but it demands the dissolution of the agrarian reserves, formed by the Revolutionary governments to protect the farmers to whom land has been distributed, and places itself in competition with a government already administering that same "gigantic task." It will carry out a vast educational program "according to the aspirations, the faith, and the traditions of the Mexican people"; but it forced the appointment as Minister of Education of Octavio Vezar Vázquez, who is reversing the whole liberal educational program and who has said, "There can be no education in Mexico without the sign of the cross behind it." It "wishes to see formed true labor unions made up of workmen without leaders"; but it opposes existing labor unions and peasant leagues and demands that "the strikes destructive to our incipient industry be ended." Sinarquismo, in brief, would disarm the peasant and the worker of all weapons—agrarian reserves, leaders, and strikes—and place them at the mercy of the authoritarian state.

Franco's "spiritual reconquest" of Spain's lost colonies is already half won in Mexico. The Sinarquista movement today is much stronger and better organized than was the Cristero rebellion which drenched Mexico in blood in the twenties. But it has not even the excuse that led to the Cristero revolt—religious persecution. There has been no religious persecution in Mexico since 1936. The church is back in full power, convents and monasteries operate openly again, and religious buildings are being renovated for the first time since 1910. A program of appeasement has been adopted in order to remove all cause for a religious revolt. But this civilized policy is being exploited by the Sinarquistas to undermine the very government which gives them religious freedom. Under the guise of the democracy to which Mexico aspires the corporate state is building its "new order"—new only in name, old as feudalism in truth.

The Coming Battle of Italy

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

THERE is a story to the effect that when a group of young army officers stationed in Washington recently conducted a pool on the Allied invasion of Europe they selected no fewer than fifty-three places as the probable location for the opening of a second front.

However, speculation regarding the next step on land of the United Nations is not entirely guesswork. If the most important fruit of the African victory, the reopening of the Mediterranean, is to be fully enjoyed, Axis air bases in Sardinia, Sicily, Pantelleria, and conceivably even in southern Italy must be effectively neutralized. The logic of the present strategic situation thus demands an amphibious move against Italy either as the next step or as one of several related steps in the war against Germany.

Nor is pure reason likely to prove misleading. The air war in the Mediterranean is fundamentally different from that over Germany. The effort here is to wipe out opposing air and sea forces and destroy base facilities and fixed defenses rather than to concentrate mainly on industrial objectives. In Germany and along the Channel Coast Allied bombers are paving the way for the ultimate defeat of the Nazis on land; in the Mediterranean they are destroying the defenses of a power that is not regarded as too strong for direct land attack. If Spanish reports of large ship concentrations about Gibraltar are correct and Allied communiqués indicate accurately the damage done by their bombers, this attempt is likely to come at once.

The invasion of Italy will not be direct. Sicily in particular and probably Sardinia as well must be cleared of Axis forces before an all-out land assault would be strategically sound. The reduction of these islands will open the way for at least three further moves. Sicily leads only to southern Italy. To the north the capture of Corsica and the ultimate invasion of the Italian Riviera or southern France from the island bases are distinct possibilities. But Sardinia could as easily provide a starting-point for an attack on central Italy.

That collection of diverse units known as the Northwest African Air Force has already made great progress in paving the way for occupation of these islands. The repeated highly successful attacks by British and American planes, the low ratio of losses of the attackers and the heavy casualties of the defenders, the absence of effective anti-aircraft fire, all attest to a growing demoralization among the Italians. Even over southern Italy the Allied air forces are clearly predominant, though the fact that the Axis can obtain reinforcements quickly from the north makes it unlikely that our fliers will gain the overwhelming superiority they enjoyed in the last phases of the Tunisian campaign.

However, air superiority alone does not insure attackers against heavy losses, as the British found to their cost at Dieppe. Italian sea and sub-surface power, shore defenses, and minefields must be reckoned with. Of these the third is easily the most important. Superior Allied sea and air power and low Italian naval morale will probably prevent any attempt at a finish fight by the fairly strong sea forces still in Italian hands. The shore defenses can to a limited extent be "jumped over" by parachute troops, and in any case are not apt to be as strong as those of France and Germany. But minefields can be planted overnight by submarines, and only the work of minesweepers under naval and air protection can provide security. This necessity, in turn, would deprive an expedition of the advantage of surprise and permit the enemy to concentrate his available forces at the threatened spot, provided he moved with sufficient speed. Thorough scouting to detect minefields and perhaps feints at several points are the counter-measures indicated. In short, to establish beachheads in Sicily and Sardinia is a much more difficult problem than was our landing in North Africa but a far easier one than the invasion of Europe along the Channel.

The armies available for an Italian adventure are now larger than those at the disposal of Eisenhower a month ago. To the British First and Eighth armies there has probably been added the greater portion of the American Fifth Army, which should no longer be needed for garrison duty in Morocco. At least ten divisions of French troops have likewise been reequipped and reorganized. To the thirty-five to forty divisions composing these armies other units would almost surely be added before an invasion attempt.

The least certain feature of an Italian campaign is the seriousness of the opposition to be expected. With heavy air and sea superiority we should, after establishing beach-heads, be able to get troops into the Mediterranean islands with greater speed and freedom from loss than the Axis. Stiffer resistance can be expected in Italy proper, where land communications are considerably more reliable. The defenders will quite probably have superiority in numbers, but in equipment, experience, morale, and air power we should have a definite margin over them. The great question is the amount of strength which Hitler may choose to devote to rescuing his ally. With a growing Allied army in England capable of striking across the Channel, he cannot afford to weaken his forces greatly in the enormously vital areas of the French and Dutch coasts. Nor can he safely recall many divisions from the Russian front or even the Balkans. However, if the Germans choose to risk disaster in the east and southeast they can probably put into Italy more divisions than the United Nations will have at their disposal. Whether these will be as well equipped and of as good quality as ours is now very doubtful. Certainly they cannot expect to match us in the air.

Perhaps the best method of weighing the probability of an Italian campaign is to consider its possible consequences. In case of success, Allied air bases would be brought within closer range of virtually all the strong points in Hitler's fortress which are at present too far away to be bombed economically from England. In addition, the conquest of Italy would place a further strain upon Axis man-power. The Italian divisions in the Balkans and Russia, however slight their combat value, do free a certain number of German units for other work.

Balancing these clear-cut advantages are certain other considerations. Italy has been more of an economic liability than an asset to Hitler, and its occupation is not likely to prove an unmixed blessing to the United Nations. Its civilian industry needs large quantities of coal and iron and some oil, and if our North African policy of feeding destitute populations is to be maintained, its 47,000,000 people will constitute a drain on our food reserves. The necessity for garrisons will likewise impose a drain on our man-power.

A greater drawback is the fact that even a highly successful invasion would be inconclusive. For the Italian peninsula, which presents few serious obstacles of terrain to an invader marching up from the south, terminates in one of the most effective natural barriers to be found anywhere in the world. Germany could hold the Alpine passes with a small fraction of the number of men that would be needed to break through them. Thus an Italian campaign, valuable in its contribution to ultimate victory, is a strategic blind alley so far as getting directly at Germany is concerned.

There are, to be sure, certain alternative moves to an attempt to penetrate Germany from the south. One is the invasion of southern France by way of Corsica or the narrow strip of shore along the Italian and French Riviera. Another possibility is the use of Italian bases for an attack on Yugoslavia. Either move would contribute to German defeat, though neither would strike the Axis where blows are immediately fatal.

With greater success over submarines, ever-increasing aerial and naval dominance, and growing strength on land, the Allies are clearly winning the war. Only enormous and highly unlikely success in the Battle of the Atlantic or on the eastern front can save Germany from defeat, and even this would not rescue it from terrible aerial punishment. But the tide of war, now running heavily in our favor, has not yet reached the flood stage. The invasion of Italy means one more year of attrition without bringing the war to an end. Barring the unexpected, we shall not gain a final European victory before 1944.

Why Did Stalin Do It?

[As was to be expected, the dissolution of the Comintern continues to be passionately discussed—by the right and by the left. In order to present our readers with a thorough analysis of the subject, we have asked persons with widely divergent points of view to state their conclusions for us. Last week we published an account of the British reaction by Kingsley Martin, editor of the New Statesman and Nation. Other commentaries are printed below. In addition to these we have asked various labor leaders for expressions of their opinions, which we hope to print in a later issue. My own view was presented in a brief editorial, The Great Hour, two weeks ago. I continue to see in the dissolution of the Comintern an excellent counter-Axis blow and a unique opportunity for labor and progressive forces to unite and to win.—A. DEL V.]

A New United Front

BY RALPH BATES

Formerly an official of the National Union of Railwaymen in England and later an officer in the International Brigade during the Spanish War

LONG before the dissolution of the Communist International, the course of the war had convinced me that there was no practicable socialist alternative to combined action by all groups to the left of center. The decision taken by the Presidium of the Comintern, however, offers fresh arguments in favor of the United Front. I shall deal chiefly with these new considerations, restating only the central argument of the general case.

That argument assumes two things: that a new society can be built only by the working class and its allied groups, and that no single party in Europe or America can reasonably hope to win exclusive control over working-class action within the time limit likely to be set. If these assumptions are correct, there is but one course open—to form a new United Front.

We have, of course, not the slightest guaranty that a United Front will achieve victory. But in calculating the striking power or the educational efficiency of a United Front, one cannot use simple addition. When the Second and Third Internationals fought to the death for the allegiance of, say, any hundred possible supporters, each group won not fifty, but twenty-five. The remaining fifty were disgusted by the spectacle of everlasting feuds and withdrew from politics. Eventually many of them voted for fascism. Similarly, when the two tendencies, origiinally represented by the two Internationals, grew together and formed the French and Spanish popular fronts, their combined strength was not the mere sum of their separate forces. They also won a great part of the inert mass. In time they might have won all if the British opposition to Chamberlainism had also created a popular front. Nearly everyone who is now against the United Front at one time agreed with this assertion.

Naturally, a new front will have to avoid the mistakes of the old. One of its principal errors may easily be avoided now that the Comintern, with creditable candor, has declared its methods to be out of date. Léon Blum's greatest mistake, I am convinced, lay in not compelling the French Communist Party to enter his government. Whether or not the French party wished to share office I do not know. But I know the situation that existed in Spain. The Spanish Communist Party did wish to be represented in the government, and the Comintern, at first, forbade it. Only the absolute refusal of Largo Caballero to form a government without Communist participation eventually forced a change of decision. Those who know the behind-the-scenes political life of the Spanish Republic will agree with me that Spain's magnificent resistance to Franco was largely made possible by this original firmness on the part of Caballero.

The dissolution of the Communist International has eased another difficulty. It has always been objected that because of disciplinary ties the Communists obeyed Moscow implicitly, even against their native judgment. This objection continues to be raised in two forms. Some insist that the Comintern has not been abolished. Others declare that the American and British Communists, even though freed from Comintern control, will continue to use the Russian "yardstick" in devising their line. Of course they will. There is no reason why they should not, or why that should create difficulties.

The British Communist Party used a Russian "yardstick" in drawing up its inspiring resolution of September 3, 1939, in support of the war. The Russian "yardstick" prompted the simple and sound argument advanced by Harry Pollitt that if the workers listened to "revolutionary-sounding phrases" and opposed the war, the democratic capitalist powers might be defeated and the U. S. S. R. be left alone to face the onslaught of Hitler's Reich. On October 6, however, the Communist Party of Great Britain changed the line. The Comintern's instructions had been received. But so strong was the native opinion that the man who reopened the debate was forced to rely upon the irresistible plea of loyalty to the International. The alternative to submission was not merely expulsion from the Comintern but the inevitable splitting of the Communist Party of Great Britain. What is more important is that, having reasoned out their position according to Harry Pollitt's original argument, the British Communists were able to preserve in full force their anti-fascist convictions. I do not say this in order to revive old controversies, but to support a vitally important contention relevant to the United Front proposal. The British Communists' original position that, bad as the British system was, it was far better than Nazism, was sincere. They are therefore a vital force, to be valued as allies. And the abolition of the Comintern, in permitting the Communists to stand by their own analyses, will again make them reliable companions in action. This is the new perspective opened by the Presidium's decision.

Russia and the Peace

BY LOUIS FISCHER

Author of "Men and Politics," "The Soviets in World Affairs," and "A Week with Gandhi" and for fifteen years The Nation's correspondent in Moscow

IS THE end of the Comintern a sign that Russia wants to discard its isolationism and cooperate with certain foreign powers? I think it is.

Stalin has been ready to cooperate with us to the extent of unloading the ships that bring him lend-lease material. If his cooperation goes much farther, I have yet to hear of it. One can, in an appeal to war-time emotions, flamboyantly declaim about the Red Army's heroic struggle against Hitler. I yield to none in my admiration of the Soviet armed forces, for I learned to love that gallant generation during fourteen years' residence among them. But the Russians are fighting because they were attacked, not to cooperate with us. If Stalin had wished to cooperate he might have started fighting earlier. Instead, he sold goods to Hitler and told the French, British, and American Communist parties to obstruct the anti-Axis war effort.

Today, however, Stalin needs more help and should get it. It is the policy of the American and British governments to give him as much as possible. That is the only sensible policy, for the Red Army has killed, wounded, and captured millions of Germans who otherwise would be fighting us. If the end of the Comintern dissipates suspicions which have inhibited all-out aid to Russia I shall be glad.

Stalin's suicide order to the Comintern also seems to indicate his desire to cooperate in the post-war settlement. But there can be several kinds of post-war settlement. I believe profoundly that the end of the Comintern is one symptom of a powerful trend inside Russia which could ruin the peace. It is a trend away from internationalism toward narrow nationalism and pan-Slav expansionism. The liquidation of the Comintern may reflect Russia's hope of establishing a concert of two or more great powers to dominate Europe.

What are the signs? No word in favor of collective security has come out of Russia for years. Maxim Litvinov, veteran champion of collective security, has been silenced by his masters. Russia has given no indication since this war started that it is thinking of the peace in terms of international organization. One will search in vain for declarations by Soviet statesmen paralleling those in which Vice-President Wallace or Willkie or Sumner Welles or Anthony Eden or Chiang Kai-shek has advocated anti-imperialism, world federation, freer world trade, a world court, or internationalism. Instead, Russia has demanded Baltic, Polish, and Balkan territory and stressed the potential role of the Anglo-Russian alliance in making the peace.

Once, the Soviet Union was the synonym of internationalism and collective security. But governments sometimes change their policies. Moscow may have abandoned the policy of collective security because the powers refused collectively to save Ethiopia, China, Spain, and Czechoslovakia. Other factors also have stimulated Stalin's efforts in the last nine years to develop a strong domestic Russian nationalism.

Beginning in 1935, and since then in mounting crescendo, the czarist past of Russia, which all good Soviet citizens hated, has been resurrected and refurbished. Czar Ivan, known as "the Terrible" even during the czarist regime, has become Ivan the Fourth, and Sergei Eisenstein, who produced "Potemkin," a film about the 1905 revolution, and "October," about the 1917 revolution, is working on a picture to glorify Ivan. Peter the Great, cruel self-driver, is another new Soviet hero. The Soviet Union always had links with Russia's past: they were Herzen, Belinsky, the Decembrists, and other revolutionists. Now the links are czars, princes, generals, and medieval knights. America's nationalism harks back to Washington, who fought for the colonies' independence, Jefferson, who preached democracy, and Lincoln, the emancipator. Stalin's Russian nationalism acclaims autocrats and oppressors. The Soviet press, which I see, nowadays emphasizes Slav "blood brothers," "war of the fatherland," and "soil." The American and other Communist parties have been devoting much energy to winning the sympathies of Slav communities. In Lenin's time all this would have been inconceivable. It is anti-Bolshevik and reactionary.

These phenomena are the source of Russia's new-found interest in Polish, Finnish, Baltic, and Balkan lands. What protection could Russia get, in the next war, from an additional hundred miles of territory, when airplanes will be flying a hundred miles in eight minutes? Territorial appetites, narrow nationalism, and power politics are stupid in the air age. Yet they are Stalin's policy.

This bodes ill for the post-war settlement. A vigorous American peace-internationalism might help counteract the Muscovite tendency. Without such influence, the present war may be lost in the peace. Since this is my fear, silence would be criminal.

Unless foreign Communists realize that Russia has grown nationalist and expansionist they will continue to allow their opinions and acts to be shaped by Moscow even though the Comintern's central office has been closed. The Comintern's dissolution, however, may ultimately open their eyes and liberate them from their ideological slavery to the Kremlin, where communism and idealism have ceased to dwell.

Stalin's Bargain

BY XXX

A noted economist from Central Europe whose identity cannot be divulged because of the work in which he is engaged

THE dissolution of the Comintern raises three questions: (1) Why was it dissolved? (2) Was the move a bluff? and (3) What are the immediate results? The Comintern was dissolved because Stalin considered the move politically advantageous—and just now political strategy is as important as military strategy. The Soviet Union today, in the early summer of 1943, is still locked in a life-and-death struggle with Nazi Germany. It is of the utmost importance to the Soviets that the war be won as quickly as possible. They have been at war barely half a year longer than the United States, but their losses, some 7,000,000 men, are about 100 times as large as those of the United States. Stalin was afraid the Soviet Union would continue to bear most of the weight of the war in 1943. Only by a full-scale invasion of the continent of Europe can England and America do their full share of the fighting. Stalin was therefore willing to remove all political obstacles to a second front.

By the dissolution of the Comintern Stalin has answered the big question in the minds of conservative elements in England, America, and the Nazi-occupied countries: If a second front is established, if it is supported by the people of the occupied countries (including Italy!), will the defeat of the Nazis be followed by Communist revolutions?

Soviet Russia, it seems to me, is interested first of all in hastening the military victory, and after that in rebuilding European Russia. It is definitely not interested in revolutionary movements now, nor will it be in the years after the war, when it will be trying to reconstruct its devastated territory. Stalin will want a considerable part of Germany's productive machinery for use in rebuilding Russian industries; he will also want help from England and America, not only in the form of food and other immediate necessities, but in the form of raw materials and machinery. For all these things—for hastening the victory and for help in the reconstruction of his country—Stalin is willing to pay a price. Part of the price will be paid after Hitler is defeated, in the form of air bases from which we can bomb Japan; part is being paid now in the dissolution of the Comintern, by which Russia renounces any direct Communist intervention in the political reconstruction of Western and Central Europe.

If this analysis of Russia's motives is correct, it answers the further question, Is the dissolution of the Comintern merely verbal, a bluff, or does it have the substance of reality? I do not think it is a bluff. Neither now when Russia is fighting for its life nor in the future when it must be rebuilt can Stalin afford to bluff. I believe the Comintern is really dead.

It is of course not possible at present to foresee all the consequences of the dissolution, but one is clear beyond a doubt. Those who are working for unity in labor, liberal, and intellectual organizations will have their hands strengthened, and cooperation among the progressive elements in every country will be facilitated. This is important for America and for Europe, particularly for Germany. After the destruction of the German military machine and the Nazi Party organization, the way will be open, though under the most difficult conditions, for a progressive Socialist movement. And if there is then no Comintern—if, that is, there is no German party whose policy is determined by developments in Russia—the fight of the progressive Socialists will have a much better chance of success.

This Is No Maneuver!

BY PAUL HAGEN

German Socialist, Research Director of American Friends of German Freedom, and author of "Will Germany Crack?"

IN ITS declaration disbanding the Communist International the Presidium made use of the example of "the great Marx," who also dissolved an outgrown International. The analogy is fairly close. The First International, after being transferred to the United States, lost all contacts in Europe. The English branch broke away; the French, destroyed in the slaughter of the Commune in 1871, was not rebuilt; in Germany, Bismarck was preparing to outlaw the young and weak movement; in Switzerland, in Italy, and in Spain Bakuninism had infected the branches. And no progress at all was being made in the United States. It was only years later, after the death of Marx, that his partner Engels occasionally gave a retrospective interpretation of the liquidation of 1876 as simply the abandonment of an outgrown form. Identifying its step with Marx's action, the Presidium makes it clear that the liquidation of the Third International is a genuine liquidation like that of the First.

This time too the step had been in the making for a long time, ever since the Comintern became an appendix to its founders, the Russians. Russian confidence in it passed away with their own illusions of an imminent world revolution. The Presidium's reference to the "growth and maturity of the Communist parties," which, it said, make this dissolution easier, is mere window-dressing, or at least another pious self-deception. Only one party in the Comintern has grown and matured, and in the grown-up organization one would not recognize the child one knew. An entirely new national and international policy is followed. Soviet patriotism and not Lenin's internationalism prevails in this party of the new generation of Soviet intelligentsia, a party for which the Comintern must have been more a liability than an asset. There may have been underlying reasons for liquidating it just now—Washington, perhaps, or the Vatican. But they were accidental. They determined only the date. The outcome was certain in this contest between the United States government and lease-lend on one side and Mr. Browder on the other. As it was also between Churchill and Pollitt. And in a body like the Comintern there could be just now no possibility of a reconciliation between, say, a German section and a Polish. The statement of the Presidium puts that frankly: "The war has placed a deep dividing line." Long before the war it had become obvious, the statement continues, that with increasing international complications "any sort of international center would encounter insuperable obstacles in solving the problems facing the movement in each separate country." Those suspecting a temporary maneuver are wrong. There will not even be a new Russian alliance with a German revolution after Hitler's defeat. After this war Moscow will certainly not grant the Germans what it still considers a nation's best weapon, a strong Communist Party.

What will follow? First, the "freed" Communist parties in Allied countries will be immediately weakened; they will pay any price to become respectable, but their offers will be rejected. Take as an indication Mr. Browder's correspondence with the New York Times two days after the decree. He says he is ready to discuss the dissolution of the American Communist Party and even "the question of suspension of the right of free political association" ("strongly opposing the proposal," to be sure, but "ready to submit to the responsible decisions that regulate our national life for the war"). To this "curious offer" the Times answers, Your party is the chief obstacle to complete American-Russian understanding; please disappear. Apart from Mr. Browder's clumsiness and the attitude of the Times, the offer will be the same all over the world, and so will be the echo.

But, as in the past, progressives can find hope too in the picture: genuine democratic and radical movements, encouraged by the liquidation of an outgrowth movement petrified into a totalitarian sect, will be strengthened by the accession of many honest and courageous Communists, particularly from the underground movements, now released from their allegiance to Moscow. The competition which characterized the recent prolonged split will gradually disappear. The factionalism developed in the past twenty-five years cannot, of course, be eradicated overnight. It will take time. But the first step has been taken. And not only will this step improve official relations between Russia and the United Nations; it will also lay the groundwork for new relations between Russia and both the coming democratic revolutions in Axis countries and the democratic movements in Allied countries. In this sense the Presidium's historical analogy is true. The new rallying point, however, will not be a revived Comintern.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

DETAILS are still lacking about conditions in the bombed regions in Germany. But the Essen Nationalzeitung of May 18 gives us one bit of news. An announcement carried by the paper on that day said that the city water was no longer drinkable, that it must be boiled before it was used. No explanation was given. One can only assume that the aerating and filter plants of the Essen water system, which serves a region containing at least 750,000 inhabitants, have been destroyed.

On May 21 the same newspaper revealed another fact. Of Essen's 200 school buildings 179 have either been destroyed, or are being used as emergency dwellings by persons bombed out of their homes, or are occupied by bombed-out offices. Radical measures have been taken to continue school instruction. All the primary schools of the city with their pupils and teachers are being moved to other provinces, as are also the four lower classes of the secondary schools. Accommodations are being provided for them in camps. It appears to rest with the parents whether their children shall be moved with the school which they attend. Many parents seem determined not to be separated from their children, and to these obstinate citizens the newspaper addressed urgent warnings, asking them what they thought would become of children who grew up without schooling, like savages, in the devastated city.

To the Very Last Consequence is the title of an article in the May number of the Bewegung, the official Nazi student magazine. This issue of the magazine was eagerly awaited because of the disturbances at the University of Munich described in this column last week, and it does in fact give some important hints about the background of the Munich revolt and executions. In veiled phrases the article makes it clear that the Nazis are dissatisfied with the spirit in many universities, not simply with that revealed at Munich. It begins:

Not everything that the soldiers observe at German universities corresponds to what they imagined while they were passing hard days at the front. We all know the type of student that gives a university a bad name, those strange outsiders who allege their preoccupation with scientific studies when called upon to do useful work. They are the ones who started the wild rumors that circulated at the end of the winter term; they always knew which universities would be closed and which sections would be "totally mobilized." Is it astonishing that such characters, disliking the honest effort and clean living of German students, have in some extreme cases instigated excesses?

This was followed by a passage which shows very plainly to what lengths the student opposition in Munich—and apparently in other universities also—must have gone. A propaganda advising the people to practice passive resistance and the workers to engage in sabotage must have been discovered:

Those irresponsible elements who in times like these summon the German people to passive resistance and ask German workers to commit sabotage in factories and to produce unserviceable weapons will be exterminated in the name of the German people now struggling for their existence. Fortunately, such crimes are not protected by a student's card of admission to the university.

As usual—and perhaps with justification—the newspaper warned against too inclusive generalizations. "Certainly from these physically and mentally decadent outcasts no conclusions can be drawn about the entire student corps." But then it revealed—and this is the first report of the event to reach a foreign country—that in the last few weeks a comprehensive "purge" of university students has been inaugurated.

Committees of rectors, deans, and student leaders have not been idle during the Easter vacation; they have been making thoroughgoing inquiries concerning every student. If the new term shows that some strange characters have disappeared, it is because they were among those who were weighed and found wanting. Nobody need fear being condemned unjustly; but on the other hand nobody must think that the knowledge he has already accumulated will assure him the opportunity of continuing his studies. A clear political attitude, unreserved and absolute loyalty to state and party, is the prerequisite for attendance at German universities. He who is unworthy will fall a victim to the hard laws of war.

It should be recalled that since Hitler the German universities have accepted only students whose fitness was properly attested by the party. The mere fact that a person was a student implied that when he began his course he had been certified as politically "safe." Not a few who two or three years ago were "safe" have in the meantime, as we see, become "unsafe."

Verboten!

THE Nazi occupation authorities in France have just issued a new black list banning the sale of certain books:

1. All English works. (Shakespeare, Byron, Shelley, and several other classics, however, may still be offered for sale.)
2. Books by Jewish authors, and biographies of Jews. (For example, the biographies of Giacomo Meyerbeer, Jacques Offenbach, Henri Bergson, and Sarah Bernhardt are banned.)
3. All books on Germany, Pan-Germanism, 'Prussianism, Nazism, etc.
4. The French translation of "Mein Kampf" is also included in the Nazi "Index," apparently out of fear that the French people may learn the aims of Hitler, so carefully concealed by the Déats, the Dorjots, the Maurras, and the Lavalis. Books by such well-known collaborationists as Suarez are on the black list if they were written before their authors entered the service of the Third Reich.
5. Finally, the works of Malraux, Remarque, Benda, and Thomas Mann, and the novels of Jules Verne, who is considered a dangerous Anglophile.

At the end of the Index are a number of technical studies by Jewish scientists on which judgment is "reserved." The Nazis evidently feel that they may be able to learn some technical tricks from "non-Aryans."

The underground paper l'Université libre offers its readers the following advice with regard to the Nazi black list: "It is the duty of every French intellectual to obtain a copy of the Index, to use every means of obtaining the banned books, to discover for himself the ideas which caused them to be blacklisted, and then to disseminate those ideas as widely as possible."

Fighting France

THE FIGHTING FRENCH. By Raoul Aglion. Henry Holt and Company. $3.

RAOUL AGLION can speak of the Fighting French with authority. He was one of the first members of the French diplomatic service to rally to General de Gaulle, and he is now in New York on the staff of the French National Committee. He has written a concise and modest book; the ardent patriot in him is constantly held in check by the jurist. There is no lack of passion and drama in these pages, but they are revealed only through a sober recital of the facts.

American opinion was stunned by the sudden collapse of France. To the present day there are still good democrats on this side who believe that the downfall was due to Front Populaire incompetence, and not to a fossilized general staff; to parliamentary corruption, and not to the forty-year-old conspiracy of Maurras and his thugs, eager for a chance to "strangle the old whore," that is, the Republic; to the Socialists and Communists, and not to the men who openly professed "Rather Hitler than Blum!" I never admired the constitution of the Third Republic; but it had stood many crises—Panama, Boulanger, the Dreyfus case, the First World War. French democracy before 1939 was no more bewildered in its policy than England or ourselves. France was no more unready than we; it was only more exposed. We have no right to cast the first stone.

It was not "France" that gave up three years ago. For the French masses the war had barely begun. They would have been eager to fight on, in Brittany, in the intact fortresses of the Maginot Line, in North Africa. France was betrayed. Only one name could insure the success of that incredible conspiracy. Maurras and Laval, the twisted brains and the dirty hands that prepared the coup, would, by themselves, have been unable to carry it out. Pétain was a legend—the modern Bayard, the Knight without Fear and without Reproach, the hero of Verdun, the incarnation of invincible resistance: "They shall not pass!" Aglion shows that Mittelhauser in Syria, Boisson in West Africa, Noguès in Morocco reacted at the first moment like genuine patriots. They wanted to fight on. Pétain's prestige overwhelmed them. Once they had submitted, the road back to national honor was barred. As for the civilian masses and, in the army, the rank and file, they never had a chance to express a choice.

But the spirit of resistance was there. De Gaulle was the first volunteer; and other volunteers flocked to his improvised headquarters. Aglion relates extraordinary deeds of heroism: young boys from Brittany, for instance, drifted far into the Atlantic before they were picked up by a British steamer. In a way which is both diplomatic and equitable Aglion tells, in the same chapter, of Giraud's escape from Germany: Giraud too refused to submit and to collaborate; he too wanted France to remain free, and on the fighting line.

The book is crammed with dramatic episodes and striking personalities: Eboué, the colored governor of the Chad region, who made his choice from the very first and saved Equatorial Africa for France; Admiral Thierry d'Argenlieu, a Carmelite monk, an authority on St. John of the Cross; General Philibert Collet, a French Lawrence of Arabia; Savet; Koenig, the hero of Bir Hacheim; Leclerc, who led the epic fight across the whole Sahara, first from Fort Lamy to Kufra, then to Ghadames and Tripoli; Catroux, Larminat, Legentilhomme, Auboyneau, Muselier—we cannot name them all. They have not allowed the flag of Valmy and of the Marne to remain in the mire.

There are substantial chapters on Resistance Inside France and the Underground Press. That home front, the most dangerous of all, was loose and sporadic at first. Gradually it became an organized movement. André Philip, as its delegate, went to London and recognized De Gaulle as its leader. The Fighting French are not a faction of émigrés; their chief power derives from the people of France.

Raoul Aglion is a diplomat and an official, not a free lance. He has no desire further to antagonize the State Department. He does not slam the door in the face of those misguided Frenchmen who, after hesitating somewhat too long, have at last broken, somewhat too cautiously, with the Vichy Kommandantur. He recalls the patriotic velivities of Noguès and Boisson; he finds it wiser not to mention Marcel Peyrouton at all; and he indulges in a bit of wishful thinking about the anti-fascist sentiments of the Bey of Tunis. But although he pulls a few punches, there is no lack of spirit in this fine little book. Reluctant as some may be to admit it, Fighting France is France—the France we love, and the France we need.

ALBERT GUÉRAD

The Noblest German of Them All

SOME POEMS OF FRIEDRICH HOELDERLIN. Translated by Frederick Prokosch. New Directions. 50 cents.

THE author of a number of the most magnificent lyric poems in German and of a fierce stigmatization of Germany, Friedrich Hoelderlin died, an old man, exactly one hundred years ago—after having lingered on earth, a peaceable lunatic, for almost forty years. Physicians who in recent times have examined reports of his malady call it dementia praecox; and with an eye on the poems of his brief period of ripeness, the psychoanalyst Jung has declared that Hoelderlin in childhood had enjoyed a bliss which he was unable to forget, and dream-pictures of it progressively had estranged him from a real life which he could not but find contrastingly coarse. Laymen in earlier decades used to ascribe his calamity to more external causes. Disappointments, misfortunes, humiliations, they thought, desolated his sensitive spirit. For all its romanticism, their conception is not entirely to be ignored.

A nursling of German idealism, the friend of Hegel and Schelling, he hymned the all-animating totality of nature; drunken with powerful sensations of it as with wine. He addressed its gods in elegiac odes and alcaics ■ Father Aether, as Sun and Earth; felt their presence in himself and their language in the secret, inborn melodies and rhythms of his soul. Probably no modern believed more single-heartedly in inspiration. And this divine poet certainly was a solitary among his fellow-countrymen. "Barbarians from of old" he called them; "become even more barbarous through industry and science, through religion itself, and incapable of any godlike feeling." Also he was seriously involved in a love affair which came to an abrupt and humiliating end, and suffered further mortification at the hands of his people's great literary representatives.

Hoelderlin had begun writing under the influence of Schiller's hymnic poems—the poems of his second period, known to us through the example the "Ode to Joy," which Beethoven incorporated in his Ninth Symphony. Schiller for a while interested himself in his young fellow-Swabian; helped him to a position as a private tutor; published the commencement of his novel "Hyperion" in one of his magazines. But Goethe's ascendancy over Schiller was increasing, and Goethe, who shrank from exalted temperaments, shrank from the intense Hoelderlin as later he did from Kleist and from Beethoven. Schiller grew icy. At Weimar Hoelderlin's inspired translations of Sophocles became subjects of mirth. The hymnist, in great material distress, once again appealed to Schiller. His letter remained without answer. During his madness, he refused to permit the names Goethe and Schiller to be mentioned in his presence.

Poetry as unfaithfully deep in mood and musical as are his elegies and dithyrambs, as singularly sublime in pitch, rhythmically unified, and ethereal in phraseology, naturally kindled other enthusiasts. Among them was the young Nietzsche, who later also was to have something to say about Schiller and about Germany. Brahms gave one of the lyrics a majestic choral setting: "The Song of Destiny." Yet it was only in our century that, mainly through the solicitude of the circle about Stefan George, Hoelderlin's supreme position amid the authors of the German ode generally was recognized. What particularly attracted the circle was his realization of the Greek ideal of the Poet—the interlocutor of the gods; and pointing to "The Archipelago"—a nostalgic rhapsody conveying Hoelderlin's dream of a Hellas drunken with divinity—Gundolf called him a Greek born out of his era. The French translations of a few years since largely were dictated by this notion. Not so the even more recent English ones, the product of the surrealist poet David Gascoyne.

What directed Gascoyne to the subject was the surrealist fascination by insanity. During his illness Hoelderlin composed a few preternaturally still poems which he dated anachronistically and on occasions signed "Most submissively, by Scardanelli." Entitled "Hoelderlin's Madness," Gascoyne's volume included translations of these curious verses. The opusculum on the whole was unfortunate. It falsified the facts: included one poem, the famous "Song of Destiny," written before Hoelderlin gave indications of his coming collapse, and two others, "Half of Life" and "Patmos"—rapturous productions, strange indeed in their mixture of gigantic imagery and colorless statements—dating from the time when, after the first manifestation of his insanity, the poet seemed to be recovering. While poetic, the translations were fluid and soft, untrue to Hoelderlin's nobly pathetic style.

The Prokosch pamphlet, on the contrary, is to be saluted. Its exhibits, fifteen in all, which face their translations, represent a comprehensive perception of the man's genius. They include "To Nature," one of the best of his odes cast in the iambic strophes of Schiller's "Gods of Greece"; two of the irregularly rhythmic prodigies of his period of dissolution; and certain of the high-songs of his maturity—among them, the alcaics "Man," "In the Morning," and "Evening Fantasy." Something like a glow cast up from a mysterious world seems to meet the mind's eye through these pensive incantations. To be sure, the translation at times verges on doggerel. It is cold in spots. Where Hoelderlin sang, "My heart called the stars brethren; the spring, God's melody," we hear, "My heart . . . discerned its brothers in the burning/Planets, and the song of God in spring." In at least one other it is false. Where Hoelderlin wrote, "Once I lived like the gods, and no more is necessary," Prokosch says, "Once I lived like the gods, and desire now nothing." Admirably, none the less, it keeps the elevated pitch: this, in the circumstances, is of prime importance. And we want Hoelderlin for English readers: not only for the reason that he possessed a perfect sincerity equaled by no recent German poet, not by Rilke or by George. He is decidedly a most desirable prize and ally because of the dazzling purity with which the transcendental direction sustained itself in him. That direction is the finally noble one. In the transcendental lies the only commonwealth. There alone all men can meet.

PAUL ROSENFELD

Russia Today and Tomorrow

MOSCOW DATELINE. By Henry C. Cassidy. Houghton Mifflin and Company. $3.

HENRY CASSIDY is an experienced war correspondent. Before he went to Moscow he covered the Spanish civil war on the Republican side, the Sitzkrieg, and the German Blitzkrieg in France in 1939 and 1940. After watching Paris fall and following the development of Vichy, he went to Berlin on a troop train and thence by train to Moscow. For more than a year Cassidy, like the ten or twelve other Anglo-American correspondents in Moscow, stumbled through the confused period when Germany and Russia were bound by a pact of friendship and making intensive preparations for war. Cassidy succeeded better than most in understanding what the Russians were trying to do.

When the war broke out, things became coldly clear. Cassidy had accumulated a useful store of knowledge about Russia and had made numerous valuable contacts in the diplomatic corps. His account of the diplomatic negotiations in Moscow and the military operations on Russian soil is thoroughly competent. But he spoke very little Russian and therefore did not understand too well the character of the Russian people "toiling and fighting with no thought of politics but only of winning the war."

When Winston Churchill flew to Moscow in 1942 for his conversations with Stalin on questions of Allied strategy and the second front, many people in Britain and America believed that the British Prime Minister had made a hit. This, Cassidy tells us, was not the case. Churchill attempted to meet the Russians on their own level by coming to a formal dinner in something described as a pair of overalls, and quibbled over questions of protocol at a time when the Russians were speaking informally and directly. The inference one draws from reading Cassidy's account, although he does not say it in so many words, is that Churchill did not succeed in impressing the Russians as favorably as he impressed the Americans.

Willkie, on the other hand, Cassidy says, made a splendid impression on the Soviet leaders; he was realistic and fair in his attitude toward the Russians as well as objective in his reports about them. Cassidy considered Willkie and his two companions, Mike Cowles and Joseph Barnes, first-rate reporters and worthy representatives of the United States.

Two chapters of "Moscow Dateline" deal with the Cassidy-Stalin correspondence. As the author modestly and correctly points out, Stalin chose the Associated Press and its correspondents in Moscow as a channel through which to say something to the world at large, thus avoiding the unfavorable reception which the statement might have met in many quarters had it been made in an official speech or through the Soviet news agency Tass. Stalin has said much more important things to his own press which have passed almost unnoticed in foreign countries. By writing a letter to Cassidy, Stalin got the ideas he was interested in putting across on the front pages of newspapers throughout the English-speaking world under the most reliable and conservative auspices, namely, the A. P.

These ideas were (1) that Russia expected a second front; (2) that the African campaign was all very well and would relieve the pressure on the Soviet Union to a certain extent, but the Red armies were still fighting the major battle of the war and would continue to do so with honor.

In his interesting remarks about Russia's future Cassidy is consistently logical. After the war, he says, Russia will be what it was before the war—Soviet. However, the Soviet system may become to a considerable degree democratized. "Stalin, who turned sixty-three years of age on December 21, 1942, may well relinquish the chairmanship of the Council of People's Commissars and the Commissariat of Defense after the war. But he will probably retain the Secretary-Generalship of the Communist Party as long as he lives, and the men of his native Georgia live to ripe old ages. As Secretary-General he will remain the autocrat of Russia, but one who is not in principle opposed to democracy."

Cassidy finds numerous indications that this partiality to democracy is already resulting in certain changes inside the country. "The regime . . . is showing its benevolence in many ways, some small, almost intangible, but all significant. The days of purges, for example, have ended." As instances, Cassidy remarks that certain streets in Moscow previously reserved for the use of official Kremlin cars are now open to traffic at large without restriction. No generals or other military men of high rank have been purged. The only one to disappear is Marshal Kulik, who has been in obscurity since well before the outbreak of the Soviet-German war.

In other words, the Soviet Union can be expected after the present war to develop in the direction of democracy. With this kind of Russia, says Cassidy, we can and must cooperate if the Allies are to win the peace as well as the war.

Fiction in Review

A SOCIAL-WORK novel, despite the fact that it is unsparing in its criticism of that profession, Caroline Slade's "Lilly Crackell" (Vanguard, $3) is the most estimable novel I have read this week. A story of America's lower depths, "Lilly Crackell" traces the career of a young girl raised in the squalor that is so apt to fringe American prosperity. When we first meet Lilly, it is 1918; Lilly is a lovable child of fourteen, about to become the mother of an illegitimate baby; twenty-four years later Lilly is the mother of six children and still the victim of almost unbelievable misery and privation. Mrs. Slade has not written an exciting novel, or even a novel which is very creative in a fictional sense. "Lilly Crackell" is a painstaking sociological report on certain aspects of democracy which we prefer to ignore for the duration. It is a salutary corrective to the fashionable assumption that because we are at war against fascism abroad, we have the right—perhaps even the duty—to close our eyes to the poverty and injustice within our own land.

Mrs. Slade's indignation that people like Lilly Crackell can exist in this country is of the slow-simmering variety that indulges neither author nor reader, and her candor is completely unsensational. She writes barely and factually, with none of the "literary" overtones that make poverty good reading: it is unlikely that "Lilly Crackell" will have a fraction of the popular appeal of a "Grapes of Wrath." But the book is no less courageous. It takes courage, for instance, to make explicit the meaning of the war for people who have never had a chance to be anything but a drain on society. When Lilly's four sons are drafted, their army allowance is her first promise of decent food and housing, but it is a bitter promise: Lilly loves her sons, and their possible loss is a high price to pay for what may be only a temporary freedom from want. As for the boys themselves, they know nothing of what they are fighting for, and, indeed, why should they? All they know is that at long last they will have enough to eat and the medical and dental care they have needed so desperately. I have no particular fondness for fiction as reform, and there were even moments when I found "Lilly Crackell" tedious. But in the current flood of propaganda novels compounded of Hollywood-Life sentimentalized generalities, a book like Mrs. Slade's shines out for its old-fashioned zeal for decency.

At quite an opposite pole from Mrs. Slade's study in social responsibility is Edith Morris's highly individualistic first novel, "My Darling from the Lions" (Little, Brown: An Atlantic Monthly Press Book, $2.50); Mrs. Morris has published a volume of short stories but I am unacquainted with her earlier work. Her novel is set in Sweden, where she was born, and has two heroines, the sisters Anna and Jezza, who tell their first-person stories in alternating chapters. Both girls are excruciatingly precious, and precious to themselves; self-love seems to be a concomitant of sensibility in women writers, and Mrs. Morris is one of those ob-the-aching-wonder-of-it-all literary women for whom a snowflake or a sausage is equal matter for ecstasy. Yet whatever my dislike of so much preciousness, I have to admit Mrs. Morris's talent. Cumulatively, her sensibility loses some of its exacerbation and even begins to take effect; after the first hundred pages I found myself acutely aware of the charm of her village in northern Sweden, almost as nostalgic for it as if I had experienced it myself. And it is certainly no denigration of Mrs. Morris's gifts to say that she frequently invites comparison with better writers than herself: for example, her gallery of decayed gentlewomen—Anna and Jezza's aunts—is suggestive of Chekhov, and the spiritual stature which she can give to the life of privacy suggests Isak Dinesen.

Edita Morris is Swedish by birth, but her experience has been cosmopolitan and she writes in English. "Ride This Night!" (Doubleday, Doran, $2.50) has been translated from the Swedish of Vilhelm Moberg. An apologue of present-day conditions in Nazi-occupied Europe, "Ride This Night!" is an account of a peasant revolt against feudal oppression in the days of Queen Christina. The outline of Mr. Moberg's novel is pretty conventional: his hero, the sole member of his small farming community who has the courage to resist subjugation, loses his land, his friends, his sweetheart, and finally his life, but dies with the knowledge that he has died for freedom. More interesting than this familiar story is Mr. Moberg's convincing description of seventeenth-century peasant customs, especially his recreation of peasant superstitions. His fund of folklore rather than his right-mindedness makes tolerable the Knut Hamsunish bread-and-water, ox-and-plow rhythm of his prose.

Ayn Rand's "The Fountainhead" (Bobbs-Merrill, $3) is a 754-page orgy of glorification of that sternest of arts, architecture. What Ruth McKenney's Jake Home is to the proletarian movement, Ayn Rand's Howard Roark is to the public and domestic buildings—a giant among men, ten feet tall and with flaming hair, Genius on a scale that makes the good old Broadway version of art-in-a-beret look like Fra Angelico. And surrounding Howard Roark there is a whole galaxy of lesser monsters—Gail Wynand, who is Power, and Peter Keating, who is Success, and Dominique, who is Woman. When Genius meets Woman, it isn't the earth that rocks, but steel girders. Surely "The Fountainhead" is the curiosity of the year, and anyone who is taken in by it deserves a stern lecture on paper-rationing.

Although I came to Xavier Herbert's "Capricornia" (Appleton-Century, $3) after it had already established something of a reputation as an exciting novel, I found it singularly dull and heavy-handed. Beginning about forty years ago when the Port Darwin section of Australia was just being opened up, it is a saga of pioneer life in a country in which all of us are very much interested nowadays. But although Mr. Herbert has an intense love of his land, his attitude toward the people who live in it is unrelentingly ironic and even contemptuous. All the characters in "Capricornia," and there are scores of them, are lower-middle-class people without education or tradition; what is disturbing is that they are also without dignity in the eyes of their author. Yet theoretically Mr. Herbert is always on the side of the angels. In his treatment of the blacks and half-castes, for instance, he supports their social and political cause by laudable if stilted argument; at the same time he never represents them with any of the virtues he assigns to them in theory. And in contrast to American pioneer life, Mr. Herbert's picture of pioneer life in Australia is markedly lacking in gaiety and heroism.†

FILMS

PRELUDE TO WAR" is the first of the army orientation films put out by Lieutenant Colonel Frank Capra's Special Services Unit. It is the sort of thing one can expect when capable film-makers work for a great and many-eveled audience—the best, I suspect, which this country has ever had—under no obligation to baby or cajole, and for a serious purpose.

The intention of the film is to tell the history of fascism from the Mukden incident through the invasion of Ethiopia. Interested experts will object that it does not tell that history whole; I think it more important that here for the first time an American film tries to give the general dimensions of a theory and practice which has customarily been treated, in government and Hollywood films alike, as if it were the hate that dare not speak its name.

The method is more verbose than I wish it were or am sure it need be; but if the American addiction to word-dominated films is crystallizing into an American form, this is a useful model. The profuse text has been vigilantly researched and on the whole is respectably written. More shrewdness has been used here to make screen images point, edge, impregnate, or explode the spoken text than I have seen used before; at times the border line is crossed into full cinematic possibility, and words serve the screen instead or even do it the greatest service, of withdrawal. For a film made up chiefly of old newsreels and confiscated enemy footage, a surprising amount is new, and a surprising amount of the new is excellent. There is an eye for the unprecedented powers which can reside in simple record photographs—the ferocious inadvertent caricature, the moment when a street becomes tragic rather than a mere street, the intricate human and political evidence in unknown faces—which is here equaled only by the quiet, dry-touched forcefulness with which such images are cut in. A newsreel poll of American war sentiment in 1939 is brilliantly used. There is a long, pouring, speechless sequence, intelligently sustained by rudimentary drumbeats, of marching children, youths, and men which is a virtuoso job of selection and cutting, and the grimmest image of fascism I have seen on a screen.

There are also faults. Over-all, the film is so crowded and so ramified that it has no ultimate musical coherence.

Things like the drummed march, which had every right to be cinematically overwhelming, are merely impressive. I found repeated references to a Mr. John Q. Public embarrassing, for I felt they betrayed an underestimation of the audience of which the picture as a whole is hearteningly free. A few production shots, like the salon bit showing the withered, rosaried hands of an old woman (which may, heaven forbid, be a stock shot after all; the salon manner has infected so much), are unnecessarily dissonant. In the effort to relieve the monotony of one commentator's voice, too many voices are used, and too many of these voices suggest the cheerful drawers peddlers and the flunked divinity students who are the normal cantors for our non-fiction films. I also noticed with regret that many of the shots devoted to demonstrating that John Q. Public's country is a horse of another color were indeed of another color, glossy and insipid; but I blame this less on the country than on the fact that few of us, conspicuously excepting Walker Evans, have yet learned how to make a camera show what a country it is. It was extremely disconcerting at the end to see a "two worlds" image of Vice-President Wallace's overdrawn to a point at which an image of the Western Hemisphere, described as "free," totally eclipses the "slave" hemisphere. The film as a whole indicates that this unfortunate piece of misorientation could not have been deliberate, but it should be rectified.

Suffocating to meet nose to nose (it is over two hours of Virginia Dare wine, women, and song), "Stage Door Canteen" is beautiful as a preview of a period piece. Any film is, but this one carries a saturation of the mannerisms of fourth-degree entertainment, patriotism, and sub-idealized lovemaking which could supply almost any twenty others. The best of the patriotism is implicit rather than overt. The lovemaking is strictly church-supper. The entertainment is best. Lack of space, libel laws, and a fondness for entertainers, all prevent any detail on the subject; but we can safely remember that every piece of entertainment, like every political speech or swatch of advertising copy, has night-marish accuracy as a triple-distilled image of a collective dream, habit, or desire. My favorite few minutes was Gracie Fields's rendition of the Lord's Prayer as set, it sounded, by Stainer or more so. In the music itself, in every gesture used to sell it and every inflection, in the reverent, faintly embarrassed audience, this is the most touching and complex bit of religious history which has ever reached the screen; the whole footage of "The King of Kings" is just a Ford hour by comparison. "Stage Door Canteen" is achingly long; a lot of the dialogue is dragged in by heels who should never have been hired even to drag it out; and Frank Borzage should have used a spare cameraman with first-rate eyes to work the Canteen floor for its wonderful possibilities. Yet this is a nice harmless picture for the whole family; and it is a gold mine for those who are willing to go to it in the wrong spirit.

George Stevens's last film as a civilian ("The More the Merrier") is partly nice and partly disappointing. The chiseling, cringing sex and claustrophobia of war-torn Washington might have delivered a really original, really native comedy, and the types set up to carry this comedy are not bad in conception; they are spoiled in the execution. Stevens has a free, pretty feeling for business (like Jean Arthur's awkwardness after the love scene on the steps), for special colorations of talk (there is some good adlibbing), and for gratuitous satire (a poke at the G-men and a snort at the surplus of women in Washington). Yet the film as a whole is a tired soufflé, for unfortunately Stevens doesn't know where to stop. Farce, like melodrama, offers very special chances for accurate observation, but here accuracy is avoided ten times to one in favor of the easy burlesque or the easier idealization which drops the bottom out of farce. Every good moment frazzles or drowns. The most flagrant example is Jean Arthur, whose mugging and whinying seemed to me as redundant and, at length, as ungratifying, as if a particularly cute monkey, instead of merely holding out his hat for a penny which I might gladly have made a quarter, insisted that he was working his way through Harvard.

I recommend a look at "Wings Up," the best OWI short I have seen, and at Paramount's "African Report" because it seems to try, even though it fails, to learn some much-needed lessons from "Desert Victory." I wanted to write here of fifteen fragments of avant-garde films which were recently shown by Hans Richter at the Museum of Modern Art, but there is only room to say that though I respected their intentions, and believed great things can still or always come of small-audience films proudly made on shoestrings, there is no substitute for the born cinematic talent which René Clair's "Entr'Acte" so delightfully showed and which nearly all the rest so depressingly lacked. Finally, I regret having missed "The Ox-Bow Incident" and for the moment can only pass on the word of trustworthy people that it is worth seeing, as I would expect a William Wellman film to be.

MUSIC

A FEW concerts at the close of the season require mention. There was fine work by the Philadelphia Orchestra at the New York concert at which Szigeti played Mozart's A major Concerto and Prokofiev's Concerto No. 1; and Szigeti himself was in top form, though his phrasing in the finale of the Mozart work was excessively accented and arch. The Budapest Quartet ended its series at the Y. M. H. A. with an unforgettable performance of Schubert's C major Quintet, with Frank Miller of the N. B. C. Symphony as assisting cellist. And the National Orchestral Association provided an opportunity to hear Schubert's early pint-sized Mass in G, which has some lovely music. On this occasion the chorus was the Collegiate Chorale of Robert Shaw, which sang three more terrible pieces by William Schuman, and, as an encore, a Negro spiritual in a way which leads me to characterize Mr. Shaw as the young Stokowski of choral conducting.

My report on the lethally dull performance of Bach's Suite No. 5 by Luigi Silva brought me a letter from a young member of the armed forces who had attended the concert while on leave. Encountering Virgil Thomson after the concert, he writes, "I asked him would he mind telling me what did he think of the cello playing, and he said he thought it was the most wonderful in the world and asked me what did I feel about it and . . . I answered quite sincerely that maybe I was prejudiced because I was a cellist but that I thought it was incredibly dull. Whereupon all the way to Times Square I was regaled with a lot of nonsense about the secret of Bach was you should do his bowings upside down with a modern bow and the color of the Suite No. 5 is marvelous because the low A removes the sudden change in quality across the strings and that the variety of color was in the score di tura whatever that might be and then the next day the Tribune carried the final say on the subject, which you can or have read for yourself."

My warmest thanks to my correspondent; and will he now write me a letter about Mr. Thomson's recent fantasyspinning on the French style. For this calls for my correspondent's technique, rather than my own mere presentation of such facts as the flatness and insipidity of Casadesu's phrasing of the long cantilena in the middle section of the slow movement of Mozart's Concerto K.595, as against the life created in the phrases by the contours and tensions of Schnabel's phrasing (and for Casadesu substitute any other French pianist); or the stolidity of the Cortot-Ecole Normale performances of Bach's Brandenburg Concertos, as against the buoyancy and sparkle of the Busch Chamber Players' performances; or that the greatest phrasing and style we have heard has been that of musicians who have not been French by birth or, as far as I know, by training—Casals, Toscanini, Schnabel, Beecham, Szigeti, Landowska, Hempel, Matzenauer, Rethberg, Schumann.

In the preoccupation with what this war has done to whole populations in Poland, Greece, Yugoslavia, Norway, there has been a neglect of the havoc it has created in the lives of our expatriate musicians in tearing them away from the culture embodied in those Paris concerts under the patronage of Princess This and Marquise That at which was played the latest piece by Satie or Sauguet or Markevitch or one of the expatriates, and in compelling them to return to a land in which the public—the wisps of hay clinging to its hair, the cow-dung to its boots—stamps into Carnegie Hall to listen to Beethoven performed by Toscanini. And the courage with which exiled Europeans in this country have fitted together again the pieces of their broken lives is not more touching than the persistence that recently produced a bit of old Paris at the Museum of Modern Art—the Serenades sponsored by a committee with a Marquise and a Prince, and devoted to "rare music ancient and modern."

The rare ancient music at the first concert turned out to be Mozart's G minor Quintet; the modern music was rarer, and I hope will be even more so, including as it did Debussy's Sonata for flute, viola, and harp, which is one of those late exercises in Debussy's style in a vacuum; a new Piano Quartet by Martinu, which provided another example of this composer's ability to spin out nothing much into nothing much more; and Virgil Thomson's Seven Chorus from the "Medea" of Euripides, on which the texts of Euripides (in Countee Cullen's translation) themselves constituted an annihilating commentary.

At the second concert there were to have been a rare harpsichord concerto of Mozart and symphony of Méhul; instead there were Mozart's early G minor Symphony, of which the performance conducted by Beecham was very exciting, and Bach's great Concerto in D minor, with the solo part played on the harpsichord by Ralph Kirkpatrick with an ostentatious lack of feeling for either the music or the instrument. And there was a Little Suite of Handel-Beecham, which turned out to be too big and with too much Beecham in the arrangement. Having no desire to rehear Falla's Harpsichord Concerto I left, and missed Anell's Divertimento No. 2, which someone told me afterward was very good. The third concert began with what was described as the first New York performance of Revueltas's "Homage to García Lorca," which turned out to be the atrocious music used in the Ballet Theater's "Don Domingo." Then came Paul Bowles's "The Wind Remains," described as a "zarzuela in one act," after García Lorca, adapted by the composer," which, as it was staged with painfully amateurish actors, carried incoherence to the point of sheer lunacy. There was also to have been an opera buffa, "Pedro Malazarte," by Camargo Guarnieri; instead there was "El Café de Chinitas," a ballet based on a folk-song recorded by Lorca, which was danced and sung by Argentinita and her company, and which was delightful. And at that point, looking ahead to what the last two concerts of the series promised, I stopped.

"El Café de Chinitas" was presented later as part of the Spanish Festival that Mr. Hurok put on for two nights at the Metropolitan Opera House. There it suffered from the huge size of the auditorium and even more from the gigantic Dali décor which had been designed as usual to prevent the eye from looking at anything else. In this expanded version the finest Spanish male dancer I have seen in recent years, Juan Martínez, made a brief appearance, in addition to José Greco and Manolo Vargas who danced superbly with Argentinita and Pilar López all evening.

Dear Sirs: Louis Fischer has a fine, idealistic streak in him. Unfortunately, however, he represents that section of the liberals who suffer from the unworldly disease called "Perfectionitis." There is nothing more unrealistic than the goals of an unlimited liberal in a world of limited means. Reactionaries and imperialists thrive in the face of such opposition.

If liberalism has suffered many disastrous defeats in the past, it is mainly because the liberals have dispersed their creative efforts by seeking to achieve all their goals at once. Louis Fischer conducts his crusades in total ideological isolation, inspired by a mystic faith in the power of noble resolves and "aroused public sentiment."

The World Federation Plan has only one goal—to stop future wars of aggression. Everything else is subordinated to this. All available means are carefully calculated so as to achieve the maximum promise of the realization of this goal within the next few years. There are three tasks which we must accomplish if we are to achieve this goal:

First, we must attack the means of making war by segregating the decisive heavy weapons and armed forces and placing them in the hands of a world organization. Heretofore this has been impossible because there has been no method which would satisfy the individual military defense of the great powers and at the same time create an overwhelming world police, independent of the power politics still prevailing in the relations between the great states. The Quota Force Mechanism achieves exactly this. Nothing so far proposed by Mr. Fischer could achieve it.

Second, we must create a framework for a World Cooperative of Nations with proper executive agencies, independent of the rivalries and selfish interests of the sovereign states. Only within such a framework can we carry out the program of world-wide economic reconstruction which is indispensable as a second line of defense against a world counter-revolution and future Hitlers. We must avoid the grievous error of putting an economic cart before a political horse. We must avoid, also, the grievous error of trying to build a purely ideal framework without taking into account the powerful forces of nationalism now dominating our world. After all, my best answer to Fischer has been made by Stalin in his dissolution of the Third International. I do not seek, like Louis Fischer, to abolish nationalism. Abolishing nationalism is like trying to abolish love. We can abolish love only by abolishing women. And we shall abolish nationalism only when we abolish nations. I merely seek to distil from the poisons of nationalism an antidote for the social cancer of war. The outcome of the coming Battle of the Peace will depend on whether we succeed or fail in integrating the forces of nationalism and internationalism in a workable synthesis. The structure and politico-economic organs of the eleven Regional Federations and the World Federation can achieve such a synthesis. Nothing so far proposed by Mr. Fischer could achieve it.

Third, we must, within this new framework, create institutions and methods for a program of world-wide education and scientific research. This is our third and most important line of defense against social injustice and violence by the few. The program of world-wide education and scientific experimentation must include experimentation in the social forms of government, which can be carried out only by free and sovereign nations. Once the nations are free from the terrible threat of aggression, the emancipated world will move by leaps and bounds toward Fischer's ideals, which are also mine. Then, and only then, shall we see the dawn of a new era for humanity—the era of world citizenship. The World Federation Plan offers at least a promise of such an achievement. Nothing so far proposed by Mr. Fischer could achieve it.

It is all very well for Mr. Fischer to conduct a sniping campaign from the clouds of dialectic sophistry. He says: "I believe that the criticism of harmful proposals is in itself constructive. . . . If I have convinced anybody, the way is cleared for a better plan." I await Louis Fischer's "better plan."

Fischer says that in his recent travels over this country he observed everywhere the urgent need for inspiration. I too have recently traveled up and down this wonderful country of ours. It is true that the people want an inspiration and seek a positive ideal. But there is something else they want much more. They want a concrete, specific, and detailed presentation of the terrifying problems of the post-war world. They are sick of noble resolves, of appeals for economic justice, of imprecations against the forces of evil. They want exact blueprints for the House of Peace they are determined to build. Not everyone was in favor of the World Federation Plan. But everyone was enthusiastic about the fact that it is the first concrete and specific proposal dealing with the vast architecture of war and peace. This was something for them to chew on. They could line up for or against it.

I don't expect Louis Fischer to line up in favor of the World Federation Plan. But I do not intend to let Louis Fischer or other intellectuals like him enjoy in peace the fruits of their convenient rationalizations. The World Federation Plan is far too organic, too concrete, and too realistic to be dismissed with elegant innuendoes.

Louis Fischer has a sensitive conscience. He must not only do a much better job of proving the "harmfulness" of the plan. He must also lend his creative efforts, adding perspiration to inspiration, and produce a better and equally concrete plan.

The Shape of Things

THE PRESS CONTINUES TO ACT AS IF THE debate between De Gaulle and Giraud were no more than the wrangling of horse-traders or the jealous bickering of a couple of prima donnas. That temperament and ambition play a part cannot be doubted. But the same would be true of any great political struggle, from a Presidential election down, and the intrusion of such personal factors in no way diminishes the importance of the issues at stake. De Gaulle's effort to purge the Committee of Liberation and the administrative offices under it of fascists and collaborationists cannot be effectively countered with the charge that he is self-seeking and vain. Yet this is what a major part of the press is trying to do. It seems to believe that for every Vichyite Giraud is generous enough to lay on the table, De Gaulle should be prepared to toss in a Fighting Frenchman. From a political point of view, this is nonsense. The only hope of a genuine concentration of French power and patriotism lies in a purge of those men who, because of their records, are disliked and suspected by democratic elements in France as well as North Africa. Americans who had an opportunity to watch the behavior of the Vichyites during the early days of our invasion tell hair-raising tales of political sabotage and anti-Allied maneuvers. And yet today De Gaulle is attacked because he wants to clean these men out. We hope and believe he will stand firm.

TO POPE PIUS XII WE ARE INDEBTED FOR A revealing picture of Italy on the brink of social upheaval. It is noteworthy in the first place that in a moment of dire crisis, with the country's man-power presumably on the alert, 25,000 workers are permitted by the Fascist regime to gather at the Vatican to hear the Pope's words. Apparently there are tides running in Italy which can no longer be checked by the Ovra. Their nature is clear from the emphasis in the pontifical address: "The weight of the present difficulties is felt by the mass of workers, who are burdened and afflicted more than others." "Working men and women conscious of their responsibility for the common good feel and appreciate their duty not to aggravate the burden of extraordinary difficulties under which peoples are groaning by presenting their claims in this hour of universal and imperious needs in a noisy manner and through inconsiderate action." Denouncing the "false prophets" of revolution, the Pope revealed their open activity. "Such friends of the people you have already heard in the public streets. . . . You recognize their promises on handbills." Perhaps even more significant, he reflected the growing opposition to the war by condemning the propaganda now "circulating among the people . . . that the Pope wished the war, that the Pope supports the war." It is a bitter day for Mussolini when he must either let Italians hear his great martial adventure denounced by the Pope or deny himself the Vatican's aid in stemming the tide of revolution.

THE LATEST APPOINTMENTS ANNOUNCED BY James F. Byrnes as head of the new Office of War Mobilization confirm the diagnosis put forward by our Washington editor two weeks ago, when the OWM was first announced. Although ten Senators asked Byrnes to appoint WPB Vice-Chairman Charles E. Wilson as his production adviser, Byrnes chose Bernard M. Baruch and Frederick Searls. Both Baruch and Searls are associated with the army crowd that is hostile to production scheduling and to the creation of a genuine over-all war-mobilization machine. Baruch's point of view has always been that a civilian war agency like the WPB should confine itself to the job of supplying raw materials, leaving control of the production and scheduling of munitions to the armed services. Searls resigned as head of the WPB Facilities Bureau when Ferdinand Eberstadt, former chairman of the Army-Navy Munitions Board, left the WPB. In our opinion the only hope of meeting this year's giant production goals is by more stringent scheduling than ever, but a large section of big business and of the military-naval bureaucracy is opposed to this. There is grave danger that through Byrnes and his new office they will succeed not only in subordinating Wilson but in pushing him out of the picture. With him would go the principal hope of a more efficient flow of components, materials, and men to the production line.

THE RIDICULOUSLY MILD SENTENCES THAT Federal Judge Thomas W. Slick imposed on the Anaconda Wire and Cable Company are certainly no deterrent to cheating the government in time of war. The Judge levied a total of $31,100 in fines after the company and its indicted officials had pleaded nolo contendere to a $5,000,000 fraud. Prison sentences were suspended. A plea of nolo contendere is the equivalent of a plea of guilty in most jurisdictions, and the indictments the company preferred not to contend tell a story that can only be called sabotage of the war effort, deliberate sabotage. This is made clearer in the statement issued by Attorney General Francis Biddle after the sentences were imposed, a statement almost universally ignored by the press. Biddle said the government was prepared to prove not merely the sale of defective wire and cable to the armed services but deliberate use of mechanisms to fool inspectors. Inspection labels were removed from tested and approved material and affixed to untested defective cable. Such practices, according to Biddle, had been going on for ten years. This makes it easy to understand the confident statement made by the general manager of all Anaconda mills to his mill foremen. "Any employee," Biddle quotes him as saying, "who is not able to get wire past these jerk inspectors ought not to be working in the plant."

THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE'S 1943 "food goals" have been badly upset by floods in the Mississippi Valley, drought in North Dakota, and unseasonable weather in other sections. The aim was an over-all increase of 4 per cent in plantings, but this has not been achieved, and in any case it would not have meant a corresponding increase in production unless conditions were as favorable as last year. Now the department's crop forecasters have stated that aggregate yields will in fact be lower than in 1942 although above the 1931-42 average. Unfortunately, the demand for food for both domestic consumption and export is also much above the average for the last decade. And it is no great comfort to be told by Food Administrator Chester Davis that total food production this year will "about match" that of 1942. For if this prediction is borne out by events, it will be because of an increased livestock production beyond the country's feed capacity. This would probably result in excess slaughterings next winter and a temporary flush in meat supplies followed by a severe shortage in animal products thereafter.

NOT MUCH CAN BE DONE NOW TO ENLARGE the current harvest beyond seeing that the necessary manpower is made available and distributed properly. But if we are to maintain sufficient supplies to feed our population and fulfil our obligations to hungry Europe we must begin immediately to plan for 1944. This was the burden of Mr. Hoover's speech last week to the American Farm Bureau Federation, though unfortunately he was more concerned with scoring political points than making constructive suggestions. For instance, while he rightly criticized the division of authority in regard to food production and distribution, his suggestion that all power should be concentrated in the hands of Chester Davis would mean abandoning the consumers of the country to a man closely associated with the farm bloc if not completely under its thumb. Moreover, while the ex-President damned the Administration's mistakes freely, he failed to mention—perhaps out of consideration for his hosts—the extent to which its hands had been tied by legislation dictated by the agricultural lobbies. Mr. Hoover made great play with the fact that since 1932 land planted to the seventeen leading crops has been reduced by 47,000,000 acres. He did not mention that a considerable fraction of this acreage was devoted to cotton, of which we have an unwieldy surplus, and that a good part of the remainder was marginal land which should never have been brought under the plow. Out in Kansas men are already worried lest the pressure for production force the breaking up of grassland and the creation of a new dust bowl. Before resorting to such desperate measures we should attempt to make better use of our arable acres even if this means upsetting Mr. Hoover's Farm Bureau friends by restricting unneeded crops which have been made profitable by artificial supports.

FROM ICELAND, INDIA, AND AFRICA COME stories about what our fighting forces think of the semi-monthly refusals of John L. Lewis and his miners to "trespass" on company property without benefit of contract. To anyone with an advance thought for the stresses and strains of the demobilization days, these reports do not make light summer reading. The resentment is acute, and the overtones are threatening. "It is a sad commentary on the American trade-union movement," writes Herbert Matthews from India, "that hundreds of thousands of soldiers would gladly become strike-breakers." It would be a great mistake, we believe, to imagine that these stories are merely the exaggerated effusions of a hostile press. Whatever the men in the army may feel about the merits of the miners' case, however much they may uphold the processes of collective bargaining, it is dead certain that they are storing up a bitterness for those who down tools while they themselves fix bayonets. We wonder if they know that Lewis today leans for support not on the labor movement as a whole, or on the Roosevelt Administration, but on elements whose distaste for the war or whose loathing of the Administration exceeds even their traditional hatred of trade unionism. We should like it to be known to the men at the front that Westbrook Pegler indignantly defends Lewis against the charge of striking against the government. And we should like them to know of the touching sympathy displayed by the New York Daily News for the heroic measures taken by Mr. Lewis to return his men to the mines at once when that untouchable in the White House compelled him to back down.

MAYOR "I-AM-THE-LAW" FRANK HAGUE OF Jersey City has once more made use of his dictatorial power over the administration and courts of Hudson County to attempt to "liquidate" all opposition to his rule. Two members of the City Affairs Committee, a small group of men who have been seeking to reform Jersey City politics for years, have been indicted for "tampering" with the election records. One of these men, J. Owen Grundy, is reported to have confessed under great pressure and to be prepared to testify against the other, John R. Longo, an Edison-appointed deputy county clerk who has already served one jail sentence for opposition to the Hague machine. The indictment of Grundy and Longo is especially strange in view of the fact that no indictments have ever resulted from the hundreds of fraudulent election charges presented to the Hudson County grand jury by the Superintendent of Elections. Leo Rosenblum, another member of the City Affairs Committee, who was appointed to the State Tax Board in Hudson County by Governor Edison, has been charged with draft evasion by a Jersey City draft board, although he has twice been rejected by the army and had appealed to the board to be placed in Class 1-a. Prior to these incidents another vigorous Hague opponent, Mayor Donovan of Bayonne, was indicted on what appear to be trumped-up charges just before election. The case has never come to trial, but Donovan is reliably reported to be ruined financially and crushed mentally as a result of his experiences. There is little hope that any of these men will receive justice in the Hague-controlled courts unless public interest and concern for civil rights by decent citizens outside Hudson County is sufficiently aroused to frighten Mr. Hague.

Something to Veto

THE labor movement as a whole has no need to apologize for the part it has played in fighting the battle for production. In a period of great strain, when there has been a huge influx of workers into the unions, when all kinds of new personnel problems have arisen, when living conditions for millions have become increasingly difficult, some friction between employers and employees was inevitable. But by and large labor's pledge not to resort to the strike—its one dependable weapon—has been honored. Where stoppages have occurred they have usually been unofficial and brief, impulsive actions by local groups which were speedily checked by responsible union officials.

The one glaring exception has been the series of strikes in the coal fields. It is not our purpose to discuss again the rights and wrongs of the miners' case, but it is clear that John L. Lewis, unlike the leaders of the A. F. of L. and the C. I. O., has adopted the attitude that winning the war is not his primary concern and has intimated that essential supplies of coal will be forthcoming only on his terms. This belligerent and unpatriotic stand has been made the excuse for the passage by Congress of the Connally-Smith bill, one of the most ill-considered pieces of legislation ever presented for Presidential signature. Seizing a long-awaited opportunity, bipartisan anti-labor forces have struck their first blow against the status which the unions have won in the last ten years. True, it is an emergency measure, due to lapse after the war, but if it succeeds in its design of weakening labor now and at the 1944 election, we can be sure it will be succeeded by harsher measures.

The ostensible object of the bill is to give the government power—which it already possesses—to seize war plants and to make the instigation or encouragement of strikes in such plants punishable by fines and imprisonment. It was the possibility that this clause might put Lewis behind bars which made some otherwise liberal Congressmen vote for the bill. But even if the government is foolish enough to martyrize him, prolonged legal proceedings are likely to keep him out of jail. Another provision of the bill orders that in the event of labor disputes in war plants a thirty-day cooling period followed by a ballot must precede any stoppage of work. This would not have prevented the coal strike, and as Senator Thomas of Utah has pointed out, if this procedure were applied to the thousand disputes now before the WLB, the whole machinery would break down. But in any case it is doubtful whether the WLB would survive the passage into law of this bill, which gives it statutory authority, for its labor members would almost certainly decide they had no place on a board transformed by Congress into an instrument directed against labor.

The final, and perhaps the most illuminating, provision of the bill is the prohibition of political contributions by unions—a clause clearly aimed at the expanding American Labor Party and the mobilization of labor votes in 1944. What this question has to do with war production is completely unclear, but war production is only a secondary interest of the promoters of this bill, which we hope the President will consign to the limbo it deserves.

The Elk Hills Scandal

ELK HILLS, California's famous oil reserve, once linked with Teapot Dome, is in the news again. Last November 18 Secretary of the Navy Knox quietly signed a contract with the Standard Oil Company of California to develop these publicly owned reserves. Two days later, without waiting for Congressional approval or a Congressional appropriation to defray the cost, Standard rushed drills and derricks to the field. On December 11 the Navy Department issued an obscure press release, which has since proved deceptive, about the signing of the contract. The contract was signed by Secretary Knox and approved by the President on the advice of Rear Admiral Harry A. Stuart, director of Naval Petroleum Reserves. In February Admiral Stuart went before the House Appropriations Committee to ask an appropriation of $1,748,000 to defray the cost of the drilling. Two members of the naval subcommittee, Representatives Sheppard of California and Coffee of Washington, became suspicious, and the committee in its report to the House on March 3 declined to approve the appropriation and expressed doubt as to whether the contract was in the public interest. On March 1 Secretary of the Interior Ickes, who had not been consulted, sent Secretary Knox a memorandum signed by Ickes's Under Secretary, Abe Fortas, terming the contract "detrimental to the public interest" and asking that a report be made to the White House.

Knox sent the President a defense of the contract prepared by Adlai E. Stevenson, the Chicago banker who is special assistant to Knox. From the White House this went to Attorney General Biddle, who assigned Assistant Attorney General Norman Littell to investigate. Littell was so shocked by what he uncovered that he went to Director of Economic Stabilization James F. Byrnes and recommended that the request for an appropriation to defray Standard's drilling costs be withdrawn. Byrnes agreed, and the Navy Department complied, discretion here being the better part of valor. In May Representative Voorhis of California told the House that he feared that under this contract Standard would have a virtual monopoly of the field and asked the Public Lands Committee to investigate. Last Thursday, in the midst of the Senate debate over the FSA, Langer of North Dakota put all that is yet known of the story on the record. Most of Elk Hills belongs to the navy. Of the 43,000 acres, Standard owned only 8,000 acres, "most of them," according to Langer, "overrun with salt water." In return for these 8,000 acres, Langer charged, Standard gets all of the oil for five years and "two-thirds of the oil after the first five years."

Yet Standard assumes no risks, and all costs would be borne by the government. This is not a fair bargain. It's a steal. And it is the kind of thing that is bound to happen when the government depends for its advice in oil matters on oil-trust men and their banker friends. The day after Senator Langer's attack, the Attorney General announced that the Elk Hills contract—approved by the President last November—had been sent to the Justice Department for study on March 26, a somewhat belated safeguard. Biddle said he expected to submit his recommendations on the contract to the President "at an early date." We believe steps should be taken to abrogate the contract, and we hope that the House Public Lands Committee, which promises to investigate the deal, will make a thorough study of it. Elk Hills is only the latest and most dramatic and scandalous instance of the rich hauls the oil trust is making under cover of the war.

The Uncertain Future

BY FRED A. KIRCHWEY

THE enthusiasm, justified or not, with which last week's victories in the Mediterranean were welcomed in every Allied country is easy to understand. The fall of Pantelleria under a blasting air attack backed by naval bombardment, and the fall of Lampedusa to Sergeant Cohen of the R. A. F., who dropped in by accident in the course of a rescue flight from Malta, were promptly taken as symbols of Italy's will to get out of the war. President Roosevelt expressed this view by advising the Italian people to abandon the struggle and set up an anti-Fascist regime. Air-power advocates, too, were quick to accept the victories as proof of the efficacy of air attack operating without support of land forces. Besides these optimistic interpretations there were tangible benefits to be noted. Pantelleria puts Sicily within easy range of fighter planes, which can now protect the Allied bombers during their raids on that island's harbors and coastal defenses. In addition, the shipping route through the Mediterranean will be far easier to defend with Pantelleria's plane and submarine bases in Allied hands. And a short step has been taken along the sea road from Tunis to the European mainland.

But even granting all this, the satisfaction displayed in the ranks of the United Nations was clearly out of proportion to the military importance of the events themselves. As George Fielding Eliot said in last Sunday's Herald Tribune, the "capture of Pantelleria was not a great victory; it was a creditable local success," and we dare not take it as proof either that air power alone is capable of deciding the war or that Italian resistance is on the point of collapse. The fact is, as Major Eliot points out, that the overwhelming concentration of bombing on this small, isolated island fortress cannot be duplicated in action against a large territory. Nothing that has yet happened justifies us in assuming that Italy as a whole will yield a quick and cheap victory. Mussolini and his Fascist henchmen know that defeat spells their end and that of their regime. They still have a large Italian army at their disposal and several German divisions. Surrender, in advance of invasion, could come only as the result of a military coup d'état—a most improbable event.

Nor will the Italian people save us the trouble of invasion. They may sense the coming defeat of their dictator; they may secretly, in great numbers, hope for it—some as a means of deliverance from oppression, more as a way out of a war that has brought suffering without gain. But even if they heard the President's advice and took it to heart, today they will not and cannot act. Italy is an occupied country, and the forces of occupation are the armies of Hitler and Mussolini. Unless Hitler withdraws his troops, which serve both to bolster the defenses of Italy and to terrorize its people, and the Fascist army turns against the regime, the people must continue to submit. Apart from scattered acts of sabotage there can be no rebellion until our troops make a successful landing in Italy. This is self-evident, and the President's words were undoubtedly intended as a stimulus to the Italian imagination rather than a spur to immediate action.

It is not likely that excessive enthusiasm will distract Allied military leaders from the heavy task ahead. They know the exact value of the victories already won and the long and bloody struggle that lies ahead. The danger is that sensational reports in the press and on the air and over-optimistic comments by public officials will have an unhealthy effect on the public mind. What the people need is not the temporary stimulation produced by exaggerating modest successes but a sturdy courage based on sober facts. This is the only sort of morale which can be counted upon to survive the agony and loss that face our armies in the months to come.

Meanwhile a sense of uncertainty hangs over the broader European theater of war. Eager speculation about the time and place of the coming great offensive, stimulated by Churchill's recent visit to Washington, has again simmered down into a mood of impatient waiting. Is Russia holding back until the British-American armies are ready to invade in force in the west? Is Germany afraid to move against Russia lest it set off that invasion? Are the Western allies delaying in order to give the Germans and Russians a chance to come to grips? The questions are anxious ones, expressing fear of a prolonged stalemate on the important fronts.

In informed circles it is believed that two contrary plans of action have long been under discussion among the leaders of the chief Allied belligerents. The first plan, apparently favored in the British and American high commands, provides for early local actions against the Continent—powerful thrusts through Italy and the Balkans which would establish permanent Allied footholds but would not amount to an invasion in full force. This strategy anticipates no early conclusion of the war; the local invasions might consume the remainder of 1943, postponing the final war on the Continent until next year. The other plan, undoubtedly backed by Russia, calls for a major invasion launched chiefly through the Low Countries with other simultaneous actions in the north and south. This plan, it is conceded, presupposes heavy early losses, but it is urged by its sponsors as offering the one chance of concluding the war within six or eight months.

Which plan has been decided upon we cannot know at this hour; the next few weeks will probably reveal the strategy of the coming year. And it is on this longer perspective that wise observers will concentrate.

The Downfall of Joseph Weiner

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, June 11

JOSEPH L. WEINER, director of the Division of Civilian Supply, has at last been forced out of the War Production Board. Chairman Donald M. Nelson, who has been trying to get Weiner's resignation for months, finally obtained it last Monday. Weiner has been here since May, 1941, when he became Assistant Administrator and Director of Civilian Supply in the old Office of Price Administration and Civilian Supply under Leon Henderson. He has been associated with the Civilian Supply Division ever since, in OPACS, OPM, and WPB, first as Henderson's deputy, then, after Henderson's resignation from that division last December, as its chief. This correspondent, who has specialized in covering the defense and war production agencies, wishes to record his own humble opinion that no official in them has a more honorable and devoted record than Weiner. None has served the interests of this country and its armed forces more faithfully or with less concern for personal ambition or interest, and few have been so shamefully attacked.

Nelson, who has never had the courage to live up to his speeches, has been mumbling for several months about the need to get a "broad-gauged man" to take over civilian supply. The quoted phrase, an odd one, is Nelson's, and I am not sure about its meaning. The less patriotic section of the big-business crowd—a sizable gathering—has regarded Weiner as an obstacle to their hope of resuming production of civilian non-essentials, luxuries, and gadgets now that Tunisia has been reconquered and, in some people's opinion, the war is practically over. Nelson didn't have the nerve to fire Weiner, but on April 15 he merged the Civilian Supply Division into a new Office of Civilian Requirements and appointed Arthur D. Whiteside of Dun and Bradstreet as its chief. Whiteside was head of the steel division in the Gano Dunn days when the President was being assured that talk of a steel shortage was "a deliberate lie." This may give one some idea of the breadth of the new Civilian Supply chief's gauge.

Weiner and Nelson have been at odds for several months. Weiner angered Nelson by supporting the Maloney bill for a separate civilian-supply agency. Though we are a considerable distance from bedrock in civilian requirements, shortages have begun to make their appearance which are serious in effect though minor in amount. The civilian economy is like a used refrigerator which needs a little repair and some replacements if it is to continue in operation, and its operation is an essential part of the war machine. All the problems of war production—materials, man-power, scheduling—reappear in miniature in the field of essential civilian supply, and the attention paid to civilian supply must increase as the total supply decreases. Officials of aircraft companies report that a major cause of absenteeism is the shortage of commercial-laundry facilities; women stay home one day a week to do the washing. Someone must obtain man-power and facilities for public laundries. Nails and tacks for shoe repairs take very little steel, but someone must see to it that that little is provided. Time is lost in key war plants when plumbing breaks down; someone must find plumbers and repair parts. Even the beauty shop is worth some attention, as war plants have discovered when they have installed such facilities and thereby cut down absenteeism. But though these interstitial activities may keep a few more small businesses alive, they offer no profit to the big fellows, who would rather use the complaints arising from these minor shortages as an excuse for resuming large-scale production of consumer durables. To the accomplishment of this objective, Weiner was an obstacle.

Big-business strategy was visible in the testimony by Walter D. Fuller on April 15 before the Maloney committee. Fuller is chairman of the executive committee of the National Association of Manufacturers. He said we were suffering from overproduction of war material, that as a result cutbacks in war orders had been decreed, that with this "backlog of war material" created by the "staggering proportions" of war production we could now begin to resume civilian production. (The N. A. M. may be staggered, but all our war fronts are still inadequately supplied.) Given these purposes, the N. A. M. might have backed the Maloney bill and sought to control the civilian-supply agency it envisaged. Instead, Fuller opposed the bill. He said that while the N. A. M. had "not been entirely satisfied" with the way the WPB handled civilian supplies in the past, the bill's "enactment is unnecessary because of the trend now increasing within the War Production Board toward greater attention to the welfare of civilian producers and consumers." The italics are mine, but the emphasis, I suspect, is Fuller's. Thus the N. A. M. lined up with Nelson, who opposed the Maloney bill because it would curtail his authority by making civilian supply independent of the WPB. The day Fuller testified was the day Whiteside was appointed.

Weiner's downfall began when he tangled last year with the farm bloc and the Big Seven of the farm-equipment industry. This part of his story is intensely illuminating, for it is another instance of the power wielded by the farm bloc and its industrial allies, power greater than that of any sector of industry or finance. It must be recalled that Weiner began his work here under Leon Henderson in May, 1941, by tackling the most powerful branches of big business. On Henderson's instructions he scheduled hearings for the curtailment of the great industries producing durable consumer goods, including automobiles, and their conversion to war production. Though these industries, acting through Knudsen, were powerful enough to retaliate by taking civilian supply from Henderson's OPACS and placing it under Knudsen's OPM, Weiner retained his job and eventually won the fight for curtailment, thanks to the pressure exerted in his support by Under Secretary of War Patterson.

But in the fight with the farm bloc and the big farm-equipment companies Weiner won but a fleeting victory, and he was eventually smeared in Congress and deprived of authority over this important field of civilian supply. One would never guess from the attacks made upon him that here, too, the armed services were on Weiner's side, that he acted with the approval and in some instances on the instructions of Under Secretary Patterson, Lieutenant General Brehon B. Somervell, chief of the army service forces, and Ferdinand Eberstadt, then chairman of the Army-Navy Munitions Board, though they lacked the courage to back him publicly when the fighting grew hotter. This part of the story also involves the first of recent lapses by the Truman committee, which here served the business-as-usual forces it had formerly exposed and denounced. Because the farm bloc and the Big Seven farm-equipment manufacturers have just won a major victory from Nelson, obtaining a huge and unnecessary slice of our badly needed steel supplies, and because of the misrepresentation and misstatements which have flooded the press on this controversy, I want to tell that part of the story in full next week.

Let's Look at Labor

I. JOBS AND UNIONS ON DEMOBILIZATION DAY

BY STUART CHASE

BEFORE Pearl Harbor it was legitimate to talk about the special interests of "labor," "the farmer," "business." The terms referred to pressure groups, often highly organized, intent on looking out for number one. The concept of the national interest, of the community-as-a-whole, had pretty rough going in the clash and uproar of these specialized aims.

Today, in 1943, the clash and uproar still go on. The farm bloc all but controls Congress. Mr. John L. Lewis clearly thinks more of the wages of his miners than he does of the threat of inflation. The American Medical Association continues to be dedicated to the principle of self-help. The silver Senators propose to die before they retreat. Heaven only knows how far our war effort has been set back by dollar-a-year men, each with his good eye on post-war markets and his bad eye on the national interest.

The boys have not yet discovered that we are in a total war, and that money is a decreasingly important consideration in total war. This, after all, is not surprising. Pressure-group politics is a kind of Grand Canyon sunk into American folklore. It is, indeed, part of the democratic process as we have known it. It is not to be filled up overnight. It took a Dunkirk to fill it up in Britain.

Even if the Nazis were moving on Pittsburgh, it is a safe bet that Cotton Ed Smith would be bawling for a subsidy for God's favorite crop, and that Dr. Morris Fishbein would be busy rooting group medicine out of Kansas.

Despite the Pollyanna headlines, the war will not be over tomorrow. The longer it lasts, the more difficult it will be for the pressure groups, even the most worthy of them, to resist the steam roller. It promises ultimately to roll them flat as pancakes. There is obviously no way to bring the war to a successful conclusion without running over those who are more interested in helping themselves than in helping their country.

This is a long introduction to a simple point I want to make about the American labor movement. As the war goes on, "labor" as a distinct concept will more and more melt into a unified national purpose, together with all other special interests. By 1946 there may be little we can call a "labor problem." There is practically none in Britain now, and none at all in Russia. In total war there is always a work problem, but it involves the whole able-bodied population. We are gradually getting around to mobilizing the man-power and woman-power of America, an undertaking which swallows up the "labor problem" as an avalanche swallows up a lonely skier.

II

What will the American work force look like as we approach Demobilization Day? As I picture it, it will number at least 65,000,000 persons. There will be 12,000,000 or more in the armed forces, 33,000,000 in the war industries and services, 20,000,000 making and distributing civilian goods. Of the 65,000,000 total, at least 18,000,000 will be women. There will be no unemployment except for those moving from one job to another—probably by official command. All available Negroes will be at work, together with levies of Mexicans and West Indians. There may be a large army of Italian, German, Hungarian, and Japanese prisoners of war wielding picks and shovels.

There are today about 11,000,000 organized workers in the country, 5,000,000 each in the C. I. O. and A. F. of L., and 1,000,000 in independent unions like the Railway Brotherhoods. On D-Day the number may be greater, but the mass infiltration of men and women from the white-collar classes, and of aliens, will present a problem in tight organization which may be insoluble. How is one to get college girls, wives of professional men, Puerto Ricans to pay $100 initiation fees and uphold the principle of labor solidarity? These newcomers will receive a liberal education in what it means to punch a time clock, but they will be as hard to organize as so many jack rabbits. If a national service law is enacted, as I think it may be, unions may lose effective control of their membership. Labor leaders are fighting such a law, and one can sympathize with them, but it seems to be essential in total war.

Though labor unions, like farm blocs and business blocs, are likely to lose power as the war goes on, they have an exciting new outlet for activity in the labor-management production committees inaugurated by Donald Nelson a year ago. There are already nearly 2,500 such committees in operation, of which 500 are said to be really going to town. They rarely go to town unless there is a union in the plant, and unless union and management respect each other. The technique of workers and managers cooperating to produce a better product more efficiently has been pioneered by the Baltimore and Ohio railroad shops and by the Amalgamated Clothing Workers. These pilot plants in cooperation are now being pushed into mass-production, as it were, through the Nelson committees. By D-Day there may be many thousands of them, giving a whole new philosophy to organized labor.

American workers as a whole, irrespective of union affiliations, will be in a stronger position on D-Day than ever before in history. Practically none will be unemployed. Average wages will be at an all-time high, with the substandard groups hauled up close to average levels. Sweating will have disappeared, and fancy pay rolls will be frozen down, resulting in an unprecedented leveling of the whole wage structure. Even the lowly farm laborer and migratory worker will be comparatively well paid for the first time in their lives. It has at last been discovered that we cannot feed ourselves and our armies without them.

The workers who used to be very poor will have both ration books and money to buy things, especially kinds of food which they could never before afford. They will derive solid satisfaction from having about as much as anybody else. Rationing is a great engine of equalization. All workers will have the satisfaction of feeling that they have an important place in the community, that they belong, that their human dignity is respected. No able-bodied person will be on relief; all the odium of charity and of handouts will have vanished. Hours will be longer than they are now, far longer than in 1940, but overtime will be paid for.

American workers will be better nourished, healthier, better dressed—even if we have rationed clothing—more self-respecting, than was ever the case in the past. No family anywhere will be in actual want. Workers will have more money in their pockets and more government bonds in the dresser drawer than they can spend. Their debts will be largely liquidated, with no high-pressure salesmen and no instalment payments on the car to worry them. Their housing, especially in war-boom towns, will continue to be deplorable. Such housing as there is, however, will be rented to them without profiteering—which is something for them to remember, both now and later.

III

When D-Day comes, the federal government will probably be underwriting the jobs of 70 workers out of 100. If the government should stop its spending overnight, 70 per cent of 65,000,000, or 45,000,000 workers, including the 12,000,000 soldiers, sailors, and airmen, would be on the street. The good health, good wages, self-respect, equality of sacrifice, money in the bank, bonds in the dresser, all rest upon government orders for war—100 billion dollars' worth a year or thereabouts.

If the orders stop, the whole social and economic structure collapses. It will take months, in some cases years, for industry to retool its plants for peace-time production, and so be in a position to hire workers in a big way. Only a few skilled men are needed during the retooling process. It will take a long time for private business to unscramble the war economy, where contracts, prices, markets, brands, advertising, distribution channels, competitive positions have been twisted into strange new patterns. If millions have no work after D-Day, no matter how much money people have saved during the war they will not spend it freely. They will be afraid, and only dole it out a dollar at a time. So the business men, when they are at last ready to produce, may find severely restricted markets.

Some incurable lovers of free enterprise are going about saying that the government must get out clean on D-Day and let private business take over. Otherwise, they say, we shall have "socialism," "communism," "totalitarianism," the end of "liberty," and other verbal terrors. They do not seem to realize that naughty words are not so hard for people to bear as 45,000,000 lost jobs. Their imaginations need retooling. Whatever you want to call it, the government will continue to direct the economy after D-Day—the alternative being the most stupendous economic smash the world has ever seen. Happily, the government will haul out of some things, like gas rationing, probably at once. Later it can haul out of food rationing, after starvation cases in Europe are attended to.

Some people have the strangest notions about our economic situation today. They remind me of the peasants under Vesuvius who look at the slumbering volcano and confidently expect it to slumber forever. Because business men are operating all out and do not have to worry much about costs or competition, because farmers are bringing every Class 4-f apple to market and getting a price for it, because semi-skilled workers are making $42.50 a week plus all the overtime they want to put in, because professional people—except lawyers—are in great demand, it is widely assumed that this is the natural order of events, will automatically go on forever, and the sooner the bureaucrats quit messing around the better even a good thing will be.

Great heavens! If "bureaucrats" in the persons of Messrs. Byrnes, Patterson, Forrester, Nelson, Land, Jesse Jones, Morgenthau, Perkins, Eccles, Ickes, Wilson were not busy ordering goods and services now at the rate of some $8,000,000,000 a month, and pumping the money to meet them with out of taxes and bond sales, there would still be 10,000,000 unemployed, Tobacco Road, and the Grapes of Wrath. If the bureaucrats calmly fold their hands on D-Day, they will make the bottom of the depression in 1932 look like a Roman banquet. Some people seem to think that if you are sitting on the top of the Washington Monument and somebody knocks the monument over, you can still sit there.

Well, the bureaucrats will not and cannot fold their hands, but they are going to have a tidy problem trying to keep the economy from falling apart when $8,000,000,000 a month of war orders are withdrawn. They will need all the help they can get from the rest of us—workers, farmers, business men—and tomorrow morning is none too soon to start planning for it. A retreat to pressure-group politics will be as unhelpful as a hue and cry from the National Association of Manufacturers to the effect that if everybody will just wait a few months or years—presumably without eating—private enterprise will find jobs for all.

Private enterprise has never employed all Americans, from the days of the canal builders onward. In the 1930's the gap was so great that even the PWA, the CCC, and the WPA could not fill it. After the war the increase in technical efficiency will be prodigious, with labor-saving devices and time-cutting methods in every industrial establishment. If private enterprise gets some help from the bureaucrats in the critical months after D-Day, it can ultimately employ a lot of workers, perhaps relatively as many as in 1940. To promise more than this is cruel nonsense—as every honest business man knows in his heart.

We have got to work together at least as closely as we are doing in the war, animated by the national interest, if we are to replace enough of the $8,000,000,000 a month to maintain full employment. Where can we find the necessary new orders? I will indicate where, but my space does not permit me to try to indicate how. Maybe you should chew on that yourself for a while anyway. It expands the imagination. The orders will cover essential post-war work. The work is to be found in six major categories, as follows:

1. A continuation of such military output as the state of the world demands.
2. The continuation and perhaps stepping up of lend-lease to feed and supply war victims abroad. This Santa Claus role cannot of course continue indefinitely, but it will be essential for some years.
3. The expansion of the production of consumers' goods—food, shelter, clothing, health services, education—to raise mass living standards.
4. The expansion of luxury items for those who can afford them.
5. Public works neglected during the war—highways, schools, hospitals.
6. Public works and services, not just to restore the country to its pre-war status, but to build it higher and finer and deeper. Another dozen TVA's. The reconstruction of a hundred cities to make them fit for the power age. The integration of our transportation system, spanning the continent with airways, railways, waterways, super-highways, pipe lines, in better order than ever before.

There is work enough here to keep all the workers of America busy for a long, long time. It is not coming down the chimney, however, while we lie cozily in bed.

We have got to get out and hustle for it, all of us; for neither the bureaucrats nor the business men can do it alone.

A MILITARY expedition to Russia has become the topic of heated discussion in the last few weeks. . . . That such a scheme should find even a moment's consideration only shows the extent of popular ignorance in matters concerning the Russian revolution, and the popular belief in quick remedies against fundamental social evils.—June 1, 1918.

TWO REVOLUTIONARY STEPS have just been taken by the government in handling the railway situation. First, the Director-General approved in one lump sum improvement and betterment expenditures aggregating $937,000,000. Next, all of the railroad presidents in the country were discharged by giving out one blanket order, which went first, not to the railway executives themselves, but to the Washington newspaper correspondents. Railroad presidents receiving $50,000, $75,000, or even $100,000 a year learned of their dismissal at their breakfast table in the headlines of their favorite morning paper. . . . Many of them will be taken back as federal managers. The malcontents will be allowed to shift for themselves.—June 1, 1918.

"JAPAN AT THE CROSS-ROADS," by A. M. Pooley. . . . The author of this book . . . regards the country as being at present run by a clique of Choshu and Satsuma men in the interests of themselves and their followers; the administration as hardening into a bureaucracy, throwing sop to the people, but doing nothing to educate them into cooperation.—June 8, 1918.

THE MOST INTERESTING political news of the week has been the acceptance by Henry Ford, Republican, of the nomination for the Senatorship from Michigan unanimously tendered him by the Democratic convention. He stated that he did so at the request of the President, and it is not unlikely that he will receive the Republican nomination as well. . . . Mr. Ford's views on public questions seem no profounder or wiser than his opinions as to peace when he sent the peace ship to Europe in 1915.—June 22, 1918.

AS WE GO TO PRESS the news from Italy is of the best. Not only have the Austrians been defeated in their offensive; they have been thrown back across the Piave, with the Italians pursuing them along the eastern bank, which they have held since last fall.—June 29, 1918.

Burmese Stumbling-Block

BY H. G. QUARITCH WALES

WHEN Senator Chandler asserted that a British army of 2,000,000 in India was being held off from Burma by about 60,000 Japanese he was speaking only a half-truth, but he was no farther from the mark than those who believe the reconquest of Burma and the reopening of the Burma road to be just a matter of releasing sufficient sea power to convoy an expedition to the Irrawaddy Delta. We cannot risk another Burma disaster. Yet we shall be paving the way for precisely that if we talk of mounting anything less than a full-fledged Pacific offensive.

Two sets of factors, strategic and human, are opposed to the success of an offensive limited to the direct reoccupation of Burma. The impregnability of the long land frontier with India must by now be generally known, especially since the appearance of Jack Belden's excellent book "Retreat with Stilwell." Suffice it to say here that but for a single track through Manipur there are only hill paths crossing range upon range of steep, jungle-covered mountains. The Arakan coastal strip offers little more hope. Below Akyab the Arakan Yoma mountains come right down to the sea and interpose an insuperable obstacle in the way of an advance to Rangoon. Besides, Arakan is the most malarial district in Burma, and we have learned that malaria is an enemy scarcely less dangerous than the Japanese. We must rule out direct invasion by land.

Suppose instead we transport an army by sea to the mouth of the Irrawaddy. We should secure a bridgehead only to find our position similar to that of the Axis in Tunisia. Our supply line would be at the mercy of enemy submarines operating from Singapore and of land-based aircraft from the many new airdromes Japan is being given time to construct. Even if we could spare enough sea and air strength to guard our very vulnerable communications and maintain our bridgehead, we should still be only at the beginning of a long and costly, as well as probably unsuccessful, undertaking.

With adequate armored forces we might make headway on the baked plains of central Burma after the dry season sets in, despite the fact that by then the enemy would be in a position to pour in reinforcements from Thailand over much-improved overland lines of supply. But in any case, before we had progressed very far, before the real battle for the Burma road had begun, we should be getting into jungle country, where our superiority in armor and aircraft would avail us little. And that is where the human factor comes in.

"The average Briton and Indian is too doctor-minded, too civilized," said Brigadier Wingate, the man who led the recent commando raid far into Burma. "We are not skilled as individuals. Our minds are dulled by the narrow troughs in which we live." Much more intensive training will be needed if the mass of our forces in India are to recapture something of the old ruthlessness and self-reliance that are as necessary for jungle fighting as they were for empire building.

There are other human factors too. A large-scale invasion of Burma would have to be carried out by Indian troops, for they alone are available in sufficient strength and with adequate equipment; and unfortunately the Burmans have a deep hatred for Indians. When I was in Burma in 1938 the current bazaar gossip ran, "We are going to have the Indians out in three years and the Europeans in five." The priority is significant, and the outbreaks in Rangoon shortly before had been almost entirely anti-Indian. In fact, there was no markedly anti-British sentiment in Burma until it was fanned by Japanese propaganda.

This does not mean that British policy can be excused of all responsibility for Burmese hostility. Before the British conquest Burma's relations with India had always been friendly. The Burmese were indebted to India for their culture and religion. Indian traders and settlers were welcome in Burma. Only after the second Burmese war in the middle of the last century was this traditional good feeling destroyed. Indian immigrants were then introduced to farm the rice lands from which the Burmans had fled northward. And when all Burma came under British rule as a province of the Indian Empire, Hindu middlemen and moneylenders flocked into the country. In later years these Indians drew the full fire of growing Burmese nationalism, for they were judged to be the immediate cause of the province's economic difficulties.

This hatred of the Indians should not be overlooked in any plan to reconquer Burma. It is said that during the Japanese invasion only 10 per cent of the population was hostile to the British, the majority being apathetic; but the active 10 per cent did a great deal of damage. Since that time a taste of Japanese occupation methods, with the shelving of independence and the impossibility of disposing of their rice crop to the Chinese, has no doubt brought disillusionment. Nothing would be better calculated, however, to throw a much larger proportion of the Burmans again into the arms of the Japanese than scale Pacific offensive. Shall it be in the north, with the direct object of knocking out Japan, or in the south, pursuing the more tedious method of cutting Japan off from its ill-gotten gains, bringing aid to China, and ultimately staging a further offensive from Chinese bases? Unfortunately, the northern short cut forces us to depend on the unknown quantity of Russia. We have no time to indulge in wishful thinking. We must plan for an offensive in the Southwest Pacific.

To me it seems that the correct strategy for such an offensive, the strategy that offers better prospects than any attack aimed primarily at Burma, with its complex strategic and psychological problems, must envisage the bypassing of Burma. We should outflank, not frontally assault, the Japanese overland supply route to the plains of central Burma. To this end our objective should be the seizure of the three-hundred-mile stretch of South Thailand—Lower Siam, between Victoria Point and the Malayan border—for here is the one really vulnerable gateway in the "Malay barrier," the chain of mountainous peninsula and islands linking Asia with Australia.

In 1934-35 I explored the old trade routes that lead across peninsular Thailand. It is a region that has seen much history and is likely to see more. Unlike Malaya to the south and Burma to the north, its chief features are not mountains and jungle. There are many excellent landing beaches. The hills are low and do not offer any real obstacle to a rapid march to the east coast. The country has good communications and a long-settled appearance.

Once the monsoon is over, conditions would favor an invader from the west, a strong Indian expeditionary force covered by overwhelming air strength. The terrain is well suited to the use of armored units, and little jungle fighting would be necessary. There is much hard open land on which new airdromes could be improvised, and the inland sea of Singgora would make an ideal seaplane base. There should be no problem with the natives, a mixed lot of Malays, Thai, and Chinese who have had little experience with the modern Indian—or with the white man either for that matter—and who are no doubt by now thoroughly dissatisfied with the Japanese occupation. Established in South Thailand, Allied forces would be in an excellent position to bring their superior air power to bear on the vital nerve centers and arteries of the occupied regions to the south. By systematic bombing they could spread havoc in a wide arc through Bangkok, Saigon, and other points on Japan's overland supply route, and southward through Singapore to submarine and naval depots in Java and beyond.

Of course the conquest of South Thailand, though of primary importance, should not stand alone. If only to divide the attention of the available Japanese forces, no doubt General MacArthur would at the same time begin the reduction of Rabaul, and the navy would conduct further "island-hopping" operations to the northward.

a full-scale invasion by an Indian army. The Burmans are tough guerrilla fighters, and sabotage is a deadly weapon. If the offensive did not bog down in the Burmese jungles, an unwilling Burma would have to be held by force. This would be a poor start for a new era under United Nations auspices, one, indeed, that might lead a good many other Asiatic peoples to doubt that it was to be a new era at all.

Moreover, what might have been militarily just possible a few months ago will no longer be so, I am convinced, after the monsoon, when Japan will have had another six months to consolidate its position. Easy passes, many of them well known to me, lead from Thailand into Burma. Tracks that for reasons of policy were long left to mules and bullock carts have now been macadamized. Troops and supplies can be poured into central Burma the moment they are needed. And only Changsha stands in the way of Japan's completion of a railroad from Korea virtually to the Burma border.

These growing difficulties do not mean that nothing should be done. Something must be done, and soon, if China is to be saved. They simply mean that half-measures are likely to end in disaster.

What we must visualize, in six months' time, is a full-

China, summoning its remaining strength, might also make an effort to break through the thinned Japanese lines in Yunnan. Thence thrusting southward, along a natural line of advance through the Shan states, its armies might aim for Bangkok.

Among the first fruits of a successful general offensive on these lines should be the cutting off of the Japanese forces in Burma without employment of a large Indian army and the attendant devastation of the country. By that time the Burmans would have seen that the United Nations meant business. If they were showered with leaflets guaranteeing real freedom, their support might be won for a specially picked Allied force which, with the help of the native population, could make short work of the isolated Japanese garrison. Instead of engaging in endless guerrilla warfare and sabotage, the Burmans might cooperate in the reopening of the Burma road and the establishment of an Allied front against Japan proper.

It is for those who have all the facts before them to balance one against another the possibility of Germany's early collapse, Russia's probable intentions, and China's ability to hold out. But it must be plain to anyone who knows the local conditions that there is no easy way to reopen the Burma road. Immense tasks lie ahead in the Pacific. Can we tackle them in time? At long last we are about to face the full implications of the loss of Singapore, which Mr. Churchill rightly calls "the largest military disaster in British history."

Georges Mandel

BY EMILE BURE

LAST week London newspapers carried the report that Georges Mandel, the former French Cabinet Minister, had died in a German concentration camp. If the account of his death which has come to me from France is true, he began to vomit blood after his first meal in the fortress of Königstein, to which he had recently been removed, and died soon afterward in great agony. He had apparently been poisoned.

I first made the acquaintance of Georges Mandel in 1903 when I was parliamentary editor of L'Aurore. It has been said that "journalism leads to all things, provided the journalist knows where he wants to go." Georges Mandel knew exactly where he wanted to go. For him the editorial room of L'Aurore was the anti-chamber of the Palais Bourbon. By the sheer force of his will, his tenacity, and his patience, despite his lack of eloquence and physical presence, he was resolved to enter the Chamber of Deputies, after which quo non ascendam! And he was prepared to reach this seat of struggle by imposing his ideas on the electorate, not by accommodating his ideas to theirs.

When Georges Clemenceau became Prime Minister for the first time, in 1906, he promptly chose Mandel, who had served him in the corridors of the Chamber with a zeal that Clemenceau's enemies at times thought excessive, as his assistant chief of cabinet. After the fall of the Cabinet in 1909, Mandel continued to be the intimate counselor of Clemenceau, always treated rudely by him but often heeded by him, too, and later acted as director of Clemenceau's newspaper L'Homme Libre. When the World War came, Mandel had serious doubts about an Allied victory. He was convinced only when President Poincaré in 1917 named his patron to head a new Cabinet. To Mandel fell the task of choosing Clemenceau's ministers. It was he who during Clemenceau's premiership actually directed France's internal politics, using both persuasion and force but always preferring force.

After the war, as deputy from Bordeaux elected in 1918, he was the founder of the Bloc national—a union of nationalists, liberals, and radicals—whose task it was to consolidate the victory. The organization failed to accomplish its purpose. Mandel recognized this at once and ceaselessly denounced the German peril. He became one of the most powerful speakers in the Chamber and even succeeded in checking Briand himself, whose pacifism he feared.

Before and after Munich Georges Mandel was the hope of farsighted patriots. They rejoiced when Daladier named him Minister of the Colonies, though they would have preferred to see him in the Ministry of the Interior, rightly believing that he was the only leader capable of clamping down on the fifth columnists, who since February 6, 1934, had been undermining French morale with impunity. The fact that he was a Jew precluded such an appointment. He said to me, "I shall be Minister of the Interior when things are at their worst and no one cares any more about the shape of a minister's nose." He was not mistaken. Just a few weeks before the débâcle he moved to the Interior office. I called there to see him before leaving Paris in June, 1940. "Things aren't going so well, Mandel." "No, things aren't going well at all. I've always said, we'll go from defeat to catastrophe until final victory. In any case, nothing of political importance will happen before December." His optimism seems unbelievable, but Georges Mandel had unshaken confidence in the Parliament—unlike Georges Clemenceau, who once exclaimed as he watched a covey of partridges flushed by some hunters, "Ah, the handsome majority!"

Soon Mandel was courageously and intelligently attempting to keep Marshal Pétain, General Weygand, and others from asking for a shameful armistice. At the Council of Ministers held at Tours just after the departure from France of Winston Churchill, Lord Beaverbrook, and Lord Halifax, who had learned from Paul Reynaud of France's decision to stop fighting, General Weygand said: "Gentlemen, we must not delay in declaring hostilities at an end. I have received a telegram from the Admiralty announcing that serious disturbances have broken out in Paris. The Communist Thorez is installed in the Elysée." Mandel, however, had himself telephoned the Prefect of Police, Langeron, before the meeting and had been assured that complete order reigned in the capital. He therefore challenged the statement of the General. "Are you questioning my word?" demanded Weygand arrogantly. Mandel calmly replied, "I don't doubt your word, but I have equal confidence in the word of Langeron, who I know is a capable administrator. Why should the Admiralty, which is not at Paris, be better informed than the Prefect of Police? I suggest we get this matter cleared up at once."

Called on the telephone, Langeron confirmed what he had said an hour earlier to the Minister of the Interior. The council therefore broke up without making a decision. But Mandel had also to deal with Camille Chautemps, the "specialist in mediation." Winston Churchill had proposed to Reynaud that France and Britain form a union. To which Chautemps had replied, "France will never become a dominion." Only one voice, Mandel's, took up Chautemps's challenge. "Would you prefer it to become a Gau?" Again the Council of Ministers reserved decision. The next day, however, it voted thirteen to ten for an armistice.

Marshal Pétain, who became the head of the government after the resignation of Paul Reynaud, immediately ordered the arrest of Mandel. I am told that for a short while Georges Mandel still believed that Parliament would observe the laws of the republic. Convinced at last of his error, he left for Morocco to form a government of Free France and to maintain contact with the British government. When Duff Cooper and General Gort arrived at Rabat he had once more been arrested, this time on the order of General Nogués.

Back in France, Mandel was remanded to prison, where his patriotic bearing disconcerted his jailers. Daily he confounded them with his scorn. The story is told that he was so certain of the future that he said to one of them, "Consider yourself dismissed as of today."

That Marshal Pétain and Pierre Laval, those two miserable traitors, should have delivered Georges Mandel to the Gestapo passes the limits of human infamy. How tragic for one of France's last great parliamentarians to suffer such an end, for a leader who never despaired of victory to die before the victory is won. "Aux grands hommes, la patrie reconnaissante" will see that Georges Mandel shall rest one day in the Panthéon.

THE NEW ORLEANS Association of Commerce, as part of its campaign against the social-security report of the National Resources Planning Board, is distributing reprints of an article that appeared in the Review of World Affairs, a British magazine whose editors are opposed to post-war planning in general and to the Beveridge plan in particular. The British people, it says, don't want the Beveridge plan, because "Britain is a country of highly aristocratic instincts. The masses are radical, democratic, and rough, but they are aristocratic to the core."

BEVERIDGE PLAN or no Beveridge plan, the Mellon plan is still going strong. Sir John Ramsden, in a recent interview printed in the London Express, put it this way: "In these times we must make every sacrifice. But if a director sees a loophole in the income-tax laws he should make as much money as he can for his shareholders and himself."

SIGN OF THE TIMES in a Radio City restaurant: "Please be polite to our waitresses. They are harder to get than customers."

THE COMPLEX problems of war-time government were analyzed by Representative Clare Hoffman of Michigan at a recent public meeting in Chicago. His analysis: "Washington's crazy. I'm crazy too, but not that crazy." The meeting was sponsored by the American Institute of Economics, four of whose founders were also founders of the Midwest Monetary Federation. Last year the latter organization sponsored a series of lectures on social problems by Joe McWilliams, New York street-corner sociologist.

THOSE who are worried about the post-war world will be relieved to know that a group of advertising agencies is even now making plans for commercial television programs when peace comes. Broadcasting, radio trade magazine, describes an experimental program thus: "A skit in which a comedian crushed his hat into a shapeless mass was sponsored by Adam Hat Stores to demonstrate how much punishment an Adam hat can take; Butterick Co. presented a model wearing clothes made from Butterick patterns; Adolph Flesher, King of the Sea Restaurant owner, and a girl stooge demonstrated the right and wrong ways of separating a lobster's meat from its shell."

"Collaboration"—Three Stages

BY FRITZ STERNBERG

GERMAN policy in conquered France has changed many times, and in the last six months it has taken a completely new direction. None of these changes have been made voluntarily; they have all been dictated by the increasing strain the war is putting on Germany's military and economic structure.

This evolution of policy can be divided into three stages: one lasted from the collapse of France to the spring of 1941; the second from the spring of 1941 to the autumn of 1942, during which time French industry was taken over and converted to German military needs; the third began when North Africa was invaded and the German general staff found itself compelled to consider the possibility of a second front in Europe.

After the defeat of France the German general staff counted on an equally rapid victory over Germany's other enemies and a quick end to the war. Its "military policy" in France, accordingly, was one of robbery on the greatest possible scale. Machines, stocks, materials, and railroad equipment were carried off. German industry was producing more war material than its armies could use, and Germany's leaders were therefore not interested in strengthening their war production by operating factories in France.

This beautiful picture faded, however, as it became apparent that British resistance would not be so quickly overcome. The Germans were still sure of victory, but they began to figure on a somewhat longer war. In the early part of 1941 plans were made for the push through the Balkans and the war on the Soviet Union. For this war it was necessary to draw on all the economic resources of the conquered countries.

The changed military situation made necessary a new attitude toward France. In the leading German economic weekly, Deutsche Volkswirt, long articles appeared on the proper policy to follow in France, urging a new approach. Only in exceptional cases, it said, should French factories or machinery be brought to Germany. This point of view was adopted officially, and some machinery was even taken back to France. Production in French factories was then systematically resumed, though naturally not in all of them. The Nazis were not interested in restoring consumer industries for the French people—most of the textile factories, for example, stayed closed—but every plant that was useful to German war production began running twenty-four hours a day. The period of industrial collaboration had begun. German firms placed larger and larger orders in France, and the German government promised that if France behaved itself the costs of the army of occupation would be reduced from 400 million francs a day to 300 million.

Then came the war with Russia. At first it brought its rewards, but the winter of 1941-42 witnessed costly retreats, and at the same time America entered the war. Germany's dream of a short war vanished.

The longer the war in Russia dragged on, the more urgent became the greatest possible expansion of German industry. German control over France grew tighter and tighter. After the Dieppe raid, moreover, the German general staff ruled out the possibility of an Anglo-American invasion in 1942. French factories were therefore allowed to continue producing for Germany. In only one field did the Nazis begin to prepare for a fundamental change—in the field of labor.

Already in 1942 Germany had a serious man-power shortage. To make up for losses at the front the government was forced to take 100,000 Germans away from their jobs on farms and in factories and put them into the army. The French prisoners of war were not available to replace them, for they had already been absorbed by German war industry. Therefore, in the spring of 1942 appeared a new phenomenon—a sudden influx of French "volunteers" for work in Germany. Before that time Hitler Germany had attracted very few workers from France. But by July, 1942, almost 160,000 had entered the Reich.

The terrible defeats in Russia were followed by the British and American invasion of Africa, and Germany's military and economic high command began to prepare for a second front in Europe. This necessitated once more a complete change in German-French relations.

Germany's economic high command had completely taken over French industry, but it felt more and more strongly that here was one of the most vulnerable spots in the German economy. The British and American aerial offensive against French factories working for Germany grew constantly heavier; losses were serious; and the proportion of raiding planes shot down was—and continues to be—far smaller than in Germany. This may be because the shorter distance from England to France makes it possible for the bombers to have stronger fighter escorts; it may be because the aerial defenses of France are considerably weaker than those of Germany. Nazi Germany is simply not in a position to give all French industrial centers as much protection as German cities. But if it isn't able to defend them it will be obliged to move a great many factories from France—and of course from Holland and Belgium too.

If England and America succeed in establishing a second front in Europe, the Nazis will adopt the scorched-earth policy of the Russians. When they have to retreat, they will leave nothing useful behind them. They are preparing for it even now. Orders to French firms are being drastically reduced, and efforts are being made to evacuate some French factories to Germany, even as the Russians moved their factories out of the war zones long before the Germans reached them.

The extent to which Germany depends on French production is shown in a statement recently issued by the German war-production chief, Dr. Michel. He reported that in the first three months of 1942 German orders in France totaled 100 billion francs. Orders placed in the first three months of 1943 will total barely 25 per cent of that amount. It is clear that the Nazis are beginning to liquidate their French "investments."

The Nazis have taken from France, as "occupation costs," sums ranging from 9 to 12 billion francs a month. Part of this money has been returned in "payment" for the product of French industry, but the Nazis at the same time have assembled "investments." At the beginning of 1942 the Wehrmacht's assets amounted to 65 billion francs; toward the end of the year they had dwindled to 25 billion. Thus, in 1942 the Wehrmacht spent the whole of the year's indemnity, plus 40 billion francs of the surplus left from 1941.

It may be remarked, incidentally, that because of these tremendous German expenditures inflation in France has increased with almost incredible speed. The note circulation of the Bank of France increased by 45 billion francs in 1941 (from 218 to 263 billion) and by 90 billion in 1942 (from 263 to 355 billion). And as a climax to the farce, the Nazi financial wizards now explain that because of the declining value of the franc the rate of exchange between the Reichsmark and the franc must be readjusted.

Since the Nazis expect an Allied invasion of France, since they are moving as many French factories as possible to Germany, it is obvious that they must increase the pressure on French workers to come to Germany. This is being done. The general staff also wants to make sure that when the Allies land in France the number of Frenchmen of military age who might help them will be as small as possible.

Germany's economic high command thought at first that economic pressure alone would be enough to make French workers come to Germany—that when their factories were closed in France they would follow the machines to Germany. When it didn't work out that way, the Nazis took their ration cards from workers who refused to come. Even so, the number who consented was so small that the Nazis had to resort to more direct compulsion. By instituting forced labor service they finally got results. At the beginning of 1943 there were about 400,000 French civilian workers in Germany. Of this number, 150,000 are said to be skilled workers. In the first quarter of 1943 a steady stream of men and women workers continued to enter Germany. And according to a United Press report, "Chief of Government Pierre Laval has placed at the disposal of Fritz Sauckel, German labor chief for the occupied territories, the entire 1,250,000 French soldiers held as war prisoners." The latest estimate of the French labor force in Germany, including civilians and war prisoners, is two million. These people are hostages in the hands of the Nazis, and as such will be used to discourage French cooperation with American and British invading forces.

As the time of invasion draws nearer, Germany's drain on the conquered countries increases. All Europe's economic life is being concentrated in Germany. Between Germany and the invading armies will lie a broad expanse of economic desert.

The two million captive French workers are an important factor in Germany's war production, but we must not forget that they, together with five million other foreign workers from all parts of Europe, will be a serious danger to the Nazis when the invasion comes—if they are given real reason to believe that we are waging political war on Nazism as well as military war on Germany.

Behind the Enemy Line

By ARGUS

THE shortage of consumer goods in Germany is much more severe than the shortage of food, and is growing worse. A great number of items, especially all articles of clothing, were rationed soon after the outbreak of war and can be bought only on points. But it is practically impossible to introduce the point system for all goods. A new device has therefore been invented. It is called the "household passport."

The "household passport" was first instituted on May 19 at Ludwigshaven on the Rhine. Now no one can buy an unrationed article, not a saucepan, sieve, or sheet of writing paper, without presenting his booklet. The shopkeeper for his part is obliged to write in the passport exactly what was bought, together with the name of his firm. Thus everybody's purchases can be controlled. If a housewife asks for coffee cups, the shopkeeper must look in her book to see whether she has perhaps already gone too far in buying coffee cups. If he thinks she has, he must refuse to sell her any. In any case the authorities can determine whether a person against whom suspicion has been aroused has been so lacking in patriotism as to consume too many brooms or lead pencils. It is a risk no one will want to run.

It is hard to understand what the German internal propaganda expects to accomplish by its continuing philippics against "grumblers." Anyone who grumbles shows by that act that radio talks and newspaper articles have no effect on him. But we can be grateful for these philippics, for from no other source do we learn so much about the real Stimmung in Germany. The Berlin 12 Uhr Blatt of May 27 devoted its front page to grumblers. And it went farther than usual with an adjective which it prefixed to the noun. The article was entitled The Ubiquitous Grumbler, a creature whom it described as follows:

He whispers the enemy's lies. He repeats the newest Jewish slogans and the most idiotic rumors. He casts suspicion on worthy men and grumbles about necessary war measures. He spreads the filthiest Jewish jokes and knows every piece of news that is likely to discourage our people.

That picture came from Berlin, where there are now as few Jews as in any German city—which makes one wonder about the "filthy Jewish jokes." Indeed, the jokes now being invented and circulated in Berlin are typical Berlin humor—pure Aryan. A Swedish traveler repeated one of the newest in the Stockholm Arbetsdet of May 31. After the last heavy bombing raid this story made the rounds: "The attack was so severe that hours later pictures of Hitler were still flying out of the windows."

Other wags live in Leipzig. The leading local newspaper, the Leipziger Neueste Nachrichten, complained of them in a bitter article printed on May 29. The editorial offices, it said, had lately been flooded with hundreds of telephone calls a day asking "whether this or that news was true." And it was always a question of some "atrocious tale" or other "lie" which the persons who called up had heard during "their illegal sessions with the London wave length." The most repulsive aspect of these incidents, the paper continued, was that the jokers were such cowards. "They never say who they are but simply hang up abruptly." It drew the astute conclusion that there must be malicious hostile elements in Leipzig and asked the public to cooperate in unmasking them.

More important is the revelation that dangerous elements have been discovered—for the first time—among the higher government employees. On June 2 the leading article of the Nationalsozialistischen Parteikorrespondenz, a paper not intended for the general public, launched a sharp attack upon persons "in responsible positions" who have shown themselves to be "merely trained experts, without genuine principles." The article demanded their discharge. "In critical times such people are a danger in public office. Their bad attitude, their lack of energy, their spiritual disintegration have a fatal influence on the morale of the people." "Anyone in a responsible position today must be capable of combating indifference, stupidity, and ill-will with strong convictions. He must be a father confessor who can hearten the doubters, punish the vicious grumblers, and extirpate the criminals." The experts show all too often a "sickly mentality."

News from Spain

Excerpts from the Talk of Three Spanish Sailors Recently Arrived in Cuba from Spain

I WAS in the port of Malaga the day news arrived that the Allies had entered Tunisia. It was a day when all restraint was cast off. The people embraced one another in the streets. They congratulated themselves. Crowds gathered everywhere, gesticulating and discussing. Many hundreds of persons were arrested that day.

The former Guardias de Asalto have been transformed into Guardias Nacionales, a new force of repression, on the pattern of the Gestapo. It has become extremely active in trying to prevent the civil population of the towns and villages from giving aid and support to the guerrilleros. Guerrillas have existed, as everyone knows, in Asturias and Andalusia since the end of the war, and no effort to dispel them has been successful. Now they have extended their influence into Castile, especially the province of Toledo. They are becoming a source of serious worry to the authorities.

In the port of Valencia I saw empty barrels being loaded on a boat for the United States. A group of Phalangists were watching the operation. Suddenly a voice came from the group: "How I would like to be one of those barrels!"

The middle class belongs to the past. In the last years people have become either very poor, real proletarians, or nouveau-riche. The best way to become nouveau-riche is to go into the black market and speculate with food.

One is a constant witness to the subjection of the Spanish police to agents of the Gestapo, which controls their activities in large cities and in small towns. It is the Gestapo which rules.

The terror in Spain has not lessened in four years. Sometimes for one month, two months, the number of executions drops, but only to mount again. It is a cruelty born of fear—fear that the Republicans will come back to power again to start la segunda vuelta.

Lately ships with wheat and meat from Argentina do not even pretend to unload at Spanish ports. They tie up for a little while, then proceed to Nazi-controlled French ports and to Italy.

In the ports of northern Spain one can see submarines entering or leaving the harbor in full daylight. They carry no flag. Everybody guesses that they are German.

BOOKS and the ARTS

"We Will Walk Like the Tapir"

BY MARIANNE MOORE

SAVAGE" and "brutal" are false terms, the brute is so often the man. In a documentary-film close-up, some years ago, of an elephant trimming a turf-bordered walk, the fingertip of the trunk was shown, plucking off grass to an edge of better than humanly sheared precision. The elephant that piles teak scans the result from a distance, and if a timber projects too far, returns and pushes it into place with his head. Here at home, as the press seems to enjoy reminding us, the army is being reinforced by paratroop dogs and patrol dogs.

In the September, 1927, issue of the Forum, in an article entitled Can Man Keep Savage Virtues, Dr. Herbert J. Spinden says, "Brutality is hardly a proper character of savages or even of brutes. . . . Real people of the wilds are timid and retiring creatures, for all their sturdiness of bone and muscle"; and in the same article he speaks of a museum exploration trip in Honduras, made with the help of Paya Indians. Despite his "ignorance of the first arts of life," he says they were willing to aid him—seven of them, besides a woman with a baby—poling their way up the Plantain River in two boats hollowed out of mahogany logs. Having several specimens of worked stone to carry, they came to a deep pool in the creek with precipitous walls on either side. The stones were lashed to poles and could perhaps have been dragged through the water by means of ropes, but saying, "We will walk like the tapir," they tramped into the pool, and across, in water three or four feet over their heads. Dr. Spinden preferred to climb the rocky wall rather than go through the water, but before beginning the climb he handed his watch to an Indian, explaining that it was to be kept dry. "The Indian wrapped the timepiece in a leaf and putting the little package in his mouth dived to the other side." The woman was taking home a large grinding stone that weighed at least seventy-five pounds, and with the child slung in front carried the stone on her back the eight miles out to the river, helped by the men only at the deep pool.

A recent lecture by Dr. Spinden—Many-Sided Latin America was the title—augmented the view set forth in the Savage Virtues article, especially certain comments on Columbus as discoverer of the discoverers of America—the Indians, namely, who brought him the first pineapples he had eaten and excited wonder by "sleeping in a strange net they called a hammock." Then in answer to questions touching on the superiority hobgoblin, Dr. Spinden said anthropologists "think there is little difference between the highly skilled people of every race. The man with skill has a flair," that is all; or should one say, that is everything. "The difference is between the best members of a group and the worst members of the group, and the trouble comes from the people who haven't quite so much superiority as they think they have." (This feeling about flair would seem to be related to Amédée Ozenfant's thought that "talent in art is the innate awareness of what is great." Nor is Henry McBride playing cat's-cradle with us, one suspects, when he says he has the answer to a question young painters incline to ask. They wish to know what makes painting great, and the answer is easy—greatness of character.)

One of the most eloquent phases of savage resourcefulness is thrift, involving as it does responsibility to nature. "The actual use is a technique"—to quote Dr. Spinden's good-neighbor discussion again—"but back of it is a discipline." When the Indian caught a salmon and threw head and backbone into the river to generate new salmon, "it was unscientific, but as emotional restraint against waste it was magnificent." After removing a plant, the Indian was careful to drop a seed in the hole, and it is humbling to realize that no species of animal or growing thing was exterminated in America till the coming of our savage selves.

In England paper, metals, rags, and bones are salvaged. One pays a fine for throwing away a used bus ticket that could have been conserved as waste paper, and the grocer is not expected to furnish a bag with what he sells but to put it into the basket or shopping bag brought by the purchaser. If inadvertent waste is dismay, intentional waste is treason; one does not like to be told by a fastidious, supposedly educated person that if we process our cans, "forty people who are paid to remove the paper from cans will lose their jobs." Self-interested waste, moreover, as part of chain advertising, is now a curious porcupine quill in the torso of slumbering civic indifference. Launched in rapid succession from widely separated cities, stout packets of order blanks and data with illustrations importune us to buy nuts, fruits, garden tools, magazines, electric appliances, dishes, or wearing apparel; and in answer to a request that one's name be removed from such and such a list, one is told it is not the firm's intention to burden anyone with an unwanted volume of mail, but that it is impossible to remove names on request, since circulars are mailed to addresses rented from others who have compiled them!

We could bear it if cosmetics that resemble house paint when worn, bugaboo perfumes, circus-wagon shoes, and lapel ornaments of the weather-vane variety could be converted into munitions. If uncompact printing and non-acute, speciously luxurious publishing could see themselves in a Joyce distorting mirror of energetic economy, alas, "Suffoclose! Shikespower! Seudodanto! Anonymoses!"

Morale, Professor Henry Wyman Holmes tries to persuade us in his book "The Road to Courage," implies something "over and above one's own advantage." What if the promoters of mother-father-brother-day spirit, and of commercialized sacred days of the calendar, should take to heart General MacArthur's words about Corregidor and commemorating an anniversary? "Until we claim again the ghostly remnants of its last gaunt garrison we can but stand humble supplicants before Almighty God. There lies our Holy Grail." Surely we are not fit to live if we have not that indomitable feeling of being strong in defeat; if we are not, as Eugene

Ginsberg puts it, under "command of the dead"—if they cannot "sineu us to victory"; if we do not "see them when we most are gay" and "feel them when we most are free."

"Be gentle and you can be bold" is an ancient Chinese saying; "be frugal and you can be liberal; if you are a leader, you have learned self-restraint." W. H. Hudson was unwilling to extol the bees for building their wonderful hexagons, since they were merely following instinct; but we are not bees, and when we undertake to be workmanly it is different; the most scientifically self-interested effort cannot effeminize one who walks like the tapir and works like the elephant.

Now It Can Be Told

WE CANNOT ESCAPE HISTORY. By John T. Whitaker.
The Macmillan Company. $2.75.

HAD this book been issued at the beginning of 1942, before the American market was flooded by the volumes of newspapermen returning from the Axis countries, it would have been a best-seller. It is written with youthful liveliness and gusto, and many "good stories" may be gleaned from it which seem plausible even when they could not, obviously, be substantiated by unimpeachable evidence. The chapters on Germany, Spain, and Russia are excellent. The chapters on France and Britain tell us nothing which has not already gone the rounds. As for the chapter on Italy, it belongs to what may be termed "now-it-can-be-told" literature.

While living in Italy on very friendly terms with Mussolini and his son-in-law and Foreign Minister, Ciano, Mr. Whitaker published in the Saturday Evening Post of December 23, 1939, an article under the appealing title Italy's Seven Secrets. He revealed that Ciano jealously kept hidden in a safe three small books, "one bound in red and two in blue." They were written in Ciano's "small smooth Italian hand," but they showed also "notations in another hand," "the extravagant jottings of Il Duce." They contained "Italy's seven secrets." Mr. Whitaker was in a position to reveal those secrets.

Anyone who knew anything about Mussolini's foreign policies during the preceding seventeen years knew most of those seven secrets before Mr. Whitaker buried his nose in Ciano's books of revelations. In the end, Mr. Whitaker could claim a monopoly on no more than two disclosures: (1) Mussolini had signed the treaty of alliance of May, 1939, with Hitler with the aim of preventing him from going to war; and (2) Hitler, by attacking Poland, had broken the Axis. The truth of the matter was that on December 16, 1939, one week before Mr. Whitaker disclosed Italy's secrets, Ciano officially stated that when signing the treaty of May, 1939, he had explicitly informed Hitler that Italy could not go to war during the next three years. The fact that the treaty had been signed with such a qualification meant that Italy's non-belligerency was in keeping with the alliance, that Hitler was at the moment content with Italy's neutrality, and that the Axis had never been broken. Had Mussolini wanted to prevent Hitler from going to war, he would not have signed the unconditional treaty of May, 1939, but would have kept

CHIMPANZEES

A Laboratory Colony

Robert M. Yerkes

For some twenty-five years Dr. Yerkes and his staff have conducted pioneer studies of the habits and social life of chimpanzees. In this book he has summed up his knowledge of the most adaptable and quick-witted of the great apes. The curious reader will be able to learn from its pages something not only about chimpanzees but about himself as well. For this ape resembles his human betters in more ways than one, and while he is an experimental subject of tremendous resources in his own right, under Dr. Yerkes' careful analysis he becomes something even more interesting.

Hitler guessing whether Italy would remain neutral or join the Atlantic powers.

The climax of Mr. Whitaker's revelations in December, 1939, was reached in the story of Hitler's and Ciano's meeting before the invasion of Poland. Ciano had told Hitler that the British and the French would fight. "The German turned on him, screaming and sputtering in his paroxysm: 'You ass! You son of an ass!' " "The conversation was terminated and with it the Axis." Inference: the French and the British should not disturb Mussolini and Ciano during the next months. Nay, they should furnish them with the raw materials necessary to build up their artillery and their tanks; when Italy's war preparations had been completed, Mussolini would fly to the aid of the "victors"—please notice "victors" in the plural, that is, not Hitler, in the singular, but the British and the French.

This was precisely what Mussolini and Ciano wanted of the appeasers of London, Paris, and Washington. They needed "all their diplomatic astuteness" to get raw materials and to prepare to attack the appeasers.

In December, 1939, Mr. Whitaker wrote: "The Italians are beginning to love him [Mussolini] as a benign figure. The people speak of him with affection and pride." When people had something to grumble about, they vented their ill-humor on the minor party leaders. But Mussolini remained, with "his matured political genius," the "wise and paternal leader." In 1943 Mr. Whitaker has revealed two more secrets. The first is that "power corrupts. Mussolini was no exception to the rule." Now it can be told. The other secret is that three months before the invasion of Poland Mussolini suffered a stroke. He then devoted himself to eroticism. He was no longer a "mature political genius," "the daring pupil of Machiavelli, Bismarck, and Cavour." He had become a tool in the hands of the German ambassador in Rome, who furnished young girls for his whims. He was now "as horrible a megalomaniac as Nero and Caligula." The man who in December, 1939, was described as "a typical affectionate Italian father romping on the floor with his youngest children" has become in 1943 an obscene, senescent satyr. That is why he attacked France and England in June, 1940. Had it not been for the stroke, he would have stabbed in the back Hitler and not France, and as a consequence he would still be a "matured political genius" and a "wise paternal leader" for Mr. Whitaker no less than for Mr. Churchill, the career boys of the American State Department, and many other respectable torch bearers of the four freedoms. I suspect that not only Mussolini but also Ciano suffered a moral stroke, not three months before the invasion of Poland, but on the very day that they were born.

While throwing mud at Mussolini, Mr. Whitaker remains loyal to Ciano. He reveals another secret. Ciano always has disliked the Germans. The Germans "ultimately will murder him." Clear is the inference to be drawn from such a harrowing prospect. The British Foreign Office and the American State Department must do away with Mussolini, but they can always do business with Ciano.

If this is "history," I intend to "escape" it with the maximum possible speed, and rather than teach it, I would hang myself.

Waldo Frank's Journey

SOUTH AMERICAN JOURNEY. By Waldo Frank. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $3.

I IMAGINE that most readers will find vastly more pleasure, as I do, in the vivid incidental murder than in the principal theme of "South American Journey." An account of the author's pro-Ally propaganda tour is of insufficient interest for a book of this length. I believe that Waldo Frank does accurately describe the state of the Latin American mind. And if there is a doubt, it is because one cannot believe that the North American or Anglo-Saxon intellectual, even when his mind contains so much valid Latinity as Waldo Frank's, can ever hope to feel the spiritual plight of the masses in the republics to the south. In fact, one's Latinity usually misleads one, for all that is truly Latin contains within it the will to fight. And if a man's Latinity is derived from the "rock, oil, and wine," as Ruben Dario put it, of Spain, then the hard rock will out and he will be mettlesome, and he will fight.

But that the war can have no interest whatsoever to a three-quarters starved Indian of Peru so long as our collaboration with the Peruvian dictatorship merely consolidates its power, Waldo Frank knows better than most of us. He knows it with his brain, however. He acknowledges that truth but does not feel its omnipresent power to depress and destroy. The reviewer is as earnest a supporter of the war as most men of his profession; yet he would hardly venture upon the spiritual insolence of asking a roto to go to war. As Frank says, we have bought the Peruvian cotton crop, for the duration, at boom prices, but the money does not go down to the workers in increased wages; it supports police persecution of those workers. Without our support of the Peruvian government, he roundly insists, unrest would suffice to stir the people to overthrow it. That the wretched sertanejo of Brazil has nothing to hope from this war is as true as that the Mexican land worker certainly has something to defend, even during the present recession of the Mexican Revolution.

With this reservation, then, that the poorer folk with whom Frank spoke comprise only one part of the mass, one can accept the author-traveler's reports. That a large part of the Argentine people were opposed to Castillo; that the intellectuals in particular are uneasy, if not enraged; that most of the clergy are not enthusiastic democrats; that the weak labor movement makes a rather pusillanimous opposition; that the pro-Axis organizations are tireless, wealthy, insolent, and violent; that the war seems geographically remote to the dweller on the pampas, are all important facts. The author's analyses of cause and effect, too, are good. He is not swept off his feet by a regime which he chiefly approves. That Chile has a popular-front government does not blind him to the fact that Chilean reformists and revolutionary parties, like most others, usually betray their followers. Nor does he give up his sensibilities when he travels in Brazil, of whose government he disapproves. Wherever he touches upon political or intellectual realities, Frank must be given full attention. But how he was entertained bores me to desolation.

Yet I would not sacrifice more than a few pages of the many that remain. In them you will find the old opulence of vocabulary that reminds one of Francis Thompson and prompts the thought that the Catholic strain in Frank is as visible as his Latinity. There is the same rich jungle of vivid "conceits" to slash through, the same spawny dampness in the air, the old rottenness underfoot and the invariable glades across which flutter the same huge blue Morpho butterflies that startled and delighted one in his other books. Unless one has Frank's metaphysical interests one will tunnel through long obscurities, or if one soars with him, as sometimes he will make you do, too often the strong wings will turn to gauze.

And, as before, you will turn over quickly the inevitable sentimental pages which tell of sexual encounters, and you will shortly come upon vigorous and manly things. After these will come embarrassing egotisms—egotisms so appalling that one wonders whether Frank dare be caught doing anything so common as listening to the Eroica. Hard upon the heels of these things will follow passages of insight quite unspoiled by petulance, egotism, or any other middle-aged emotion. You will be startled by such horrible great zombies as Frank's description of a folk as "earth-strong, earth-sick with the langorous longing of all earth to emerge and transcend itself: whether in trees, in bodies, or in dream." And on the same page you will nod your head approvingly at such a phrase, vivid, slightly overripe, and characteristically Frankian, as "Uriburú—Brazilian buzzards—wheel and dip; black, wise birds with red heads to show the carnality of their brains." In short, "South American Journey" is typical Waldo Frank—a jungle, but not by the orderly, clarity-loving Henri Rousseau.

It is, one notes, not his propaganda mission which brings out the best in Frank as a writer. His account of Brazil, where he lectured but little, far surpasses the chapters on the other countries. It is as if the vast spaces of the Argentine pampas allowed this forest-mind, this wanderer in damp green caverns, to become too diffuse, as if they flooded him with an excess of light and air. His Amazonian interlude is one of the best accounts of that land of heavy rainfall, brown forest rivers, and will-less derelicts that I have ever read. His warm-hearted and exact appreciation of the Negro people will give delight. It is a fascinating land, and though I know no more of Brazil than Rio, as I read I felt as if Frank and I were talking about a journey that we had made together.

RALPH BATES

Capitalism as a Fascist Plot

BUSINESS AS A SYSTEM OF POWER. By Robert A. Brady. Columbia University Press. $3.

SOME people these days are working on the problem of post-war corporate reserves—trying to see how the shift back to peace can be made easier. Others raise their sights and aim at stable, full employment through supplementary government action, or at keeping the market as free and competitive as possible by means of lower tariffs, anti-trust enforcement, dissolution, cooperative competition, and the like. Pessimists, fearful about our own lack of social and economic inventiveness, hope that Britain or Europe will work out something that we can borrow if and when the need arises. Still others talk about a mixed economy and how it can keep political power divided and flexible.

Professor Brady will have none of these things. Instead, his latest book is in the corrosive tradition of the early 1930's and consists of an indictment of the élite of capitalism and their power system. The book is not even a complete bill of indictment since it lacks a prayer for relief. And since it contains a sustained, though low-pitched and querulous, polemic, it can hardly be called a work of scientific scholarship. It does, nevertheless, marshal a tremendous array of facts, and its footnotes are often fascinating.

A chapter is devoted to the formation and behavior of each of the peak associations (Spitzenverbände) of manufacturers of Nazi Germany, Fascist Italy, Japan, Vichy France, Britain, and the United States. Final chapters weave together the economic, social, and political implications of these power concentrations.

Professor Brady tells us that "nothing fundamental in the history, program, structure of organization, or social outlook divides clearly the policies of the Spitzenverbände within the 'totalitarian' countries from those of the liberal-capitalist states." And having isolated the supporting facts from everything else, he proves the point. This seems to me a good deal like proving that all steel rolling mills have a close physical resemblance to each other, whether they are found in Russia, Germany, or the United States.

But the author is a first-class fact-gatherer. He is aware of the notorious political impotence of the German middle classes and the contempt for democracy of the Prussian Junkers. As the most important spiritual source of Italian fascism, the book describes at length the social views of the Catholic church. In Japan the present consciously totalitarian set-up "represents in principle nothing essentially new for the Japanese," and Brady then stresses the past and present might of the Zaibatsu, the term being generally confined to the four great commercial families—Mitsui, Mitsubishi, Sumitomo, and Yasuda.

Thus by playing fair with his readers Professor Brady has spoiled the implications of his own case. He will convince many that Axis humanity and its habits come from Mars and not from this earth. The answer is almost too easy: In this country we have no feudal ruling class of democracy haters, and our middle people have usually been up to their political jobs; all we know about medieval Catholicism we have read in books; and for us a totalitarian regime would be as new as an epidemic of bubonic plague. On top of it all, we are on our way toward twelve years of the administration of our government by a regime heartily hated by our own peak association, the National Association of Manufacturers.

Actually, of course, the case is impossible to prove either way. The three Axis nations are and always were uniquely different from the liberal capitalist democracies and different in ways in which the democracies do not differ from each other. On the other hand, another Huey Long could certainly some day be bowed into power by some of our leading magistrates—there is no social law that would prevent it happening eventually even here.

A serious book like this, written during the second world war in a generation and while most of the melancholy problems of the between-wars period are still unsolved, demands a sequel. What sequel the author could possibly write remains hidden during the reading of most of the book. He clearly could not work on the problems of the free market and monopolistic competition because he believes that economic power frustrated by political means will seek and get political power. He could not, apparently, work toward a mixed system with powers permanently divided between different groups, because for him economic, social, and political control moves steadily toward unity, and whoever tries to stop the confluence is wasting his time.

Toward the end of the book, however, there is a hint about the needed sequel: "Contrary to certain implications of current usage, 'totalitarianism,' like 'bureaucracy,' is not necessarily undesirable if it is a coherent unifying philosophy and a general program of action which comprehend the totality of organized social life." And on the very last page occurs the phrase "anti-democratic 'totalitarianism.'" This implies of course that there is a "democratic totalitarianism" that can save us before it is too late.

Professor Brady should write his next book about "democratic totalitarianism," which seems to me to be a squared circle and a semantic monstrosity.

Art Notes

EXHIBITION OF DRAWINGS from "Me and the Army" by Corporal Richard Gaige. Knoedler Galleries, 14 East Fifty-seventh Street, until June 18.

Every possible innocuous activity of Corporal Gaige's life in the army is covered by these neat but uninspired drawings. They should reassure any anxious mother about the busy dulness of her soldier son.

RECENT PAINTINGS by Milton Avery. Paul Rosenberg and Company, 16 East Fifty-seventh Street, until June 26.

Milton Avery paints large flat empty people in large flat empty spaces. Why do people who have so little to paint always choose the biggest canvases? Two of the landscapes, "Gaspé" and "Little Fox River," have a certain charm owing to their color, and "Green Settee" has design as well.

ALFRED H. MAURER. Buchholz Gallery, 32 East Fifty-seventh Street, until June 26.

Alfred H. Maurer, who was pursued by that "single hound, my own identity," is a really stimulating American painter. He committed suicide in 1932, and as is so often the case with good painters, received very little recognition until after his death. Elizabeth McCausland says in the preface to the catalogue that his work is dominated by "two categories of content, abstract still lifes and portraits of a woman. . . . It is as if the energy of his life had split into two streams running side by side—the one devoted to aesthetics, the other to the sublimation of personal experience." If this is true, then his capacity for personal experience fell far short of his capacity for aesthetic experience. His abstract still lifes have immense vitality, while the portraits become less alive as they become less abstract. One of them, however, No. 23, is superb and can compare with the best of the still lifes, Nos. 1, 2, 4, 11, and, finest of all, No. 13.

JEAN CONNOLLY

MUSIC

THE Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo has in "Rodeo" a beautiful ballet which is still fresh and bright and excellently danced, not only by the principals but by all the participants. It gives Franklin one of his best roles—one which makes good use of his agility and charm; Roudenko is very good as the cowgirl, though de Mille herself is even better; but Pagent, whom I saw once in place of Kokitch, was very poor.

In addition there is "Le Beau Danube," suffering from the general shabbiness and half-heartedness, the general deterioration of personnel, the particular loss of Massine, but still delightful with Danilova in her old role of the street dancer, Youskevitch youthful and brilliant as the hussar, if not all that Massine was, and Woickovska once in a while as the first dancer.

There is "Gaité Parisienne," also down-at-the-heel, with the great hope where Massine's Peruvian used to be not filled by either substitute that I saw; but made exciting by the exquisite grace and emotion of Danilova's dancing as the glove-seller—the trouble being, however, that half the time one is likely to see instead the meaningless twirling and kicking of Slavenska in the part, which the audience applauds just as wildly.

Of older classics there is "The Afternoon of a Faun." In his comment on the Nijinsky photographs in Dance Index Edwin Denby remarks: "One can see that present dancers of Faun have not even learned Nijinsky's stance." That is something my unprofessional eye is unable to perceive; but I have no doubt of its truth, and of the fact that the "Faun" I saw a few weeks ago is vastly changed in detail from the one I saw in 1916. But what remains of the original conception is enough to make it a wonderful thing even in its present state. As for Youskevitch's performance, I think I would have found it impressive if I had not been seated so near the stage as to be distracted by grease-paint, straining muscles, and the like.

Of "Carnaval" I could get only a few glimpses from the second row on the extreme side—some of them of Woickovska's vivacity and brilliance as Columbine. "Les Sylphides," with Slavenska, I did not see. Things like "The Magic Swan" and "The Nutcracker," which are endurable only if perfectly done, were made unendurable by the bad costumes, the sloppiness of the supporting company, the meaningless agility of Slavenska—the only redeeming feature being the few moments of Youskevitch's solo leaps and turns. Of that sort of ballet "Coppelia" came out best—with some brightness and life in the production, and Slavenska quite charming. "Scheherazade" and "Prince Igor" I did not dare to see.

The new ballets were Fokine's "Igorouchki," a little Chauve-Souris piece with Danilova, and his "Elves," which was even worse than the new ballets of last fall, Nijinska's "Chopin Concerto" and "Snow Maiden." "Pas de deux classique" turned out to be the pas de deux from "The Magic Swan," with Danilova giving the movements the flow of pattern and emotion they had lacked in Slavenska's performance.

Mark Woods, president of the Blue Network, was reported by the Times to have said that in commissioning Roy Harris to write a Sixth Symphony he had "made no demands or even suggestions"—don't applaud yet—"other than to hope that since he is essentially a man of the soil and one of our own his Sixth Symphony will be dedicated to the American fighting forces, and that it will be a symbol of the struggle which our nation is making and has made throughout its eventful history for the freedom of mankind." Only a hope; and such a modest little hope, too; and right up the alley of the Shostakovich of America, who on any occasion of blood and tears stands ready and eager to commune publicly with his soul in forty-five minutes of incoherently bombastic sound accompanied by several pages of program-notes about why he did it and how he did it. In accepting the commission, reported the Times, "Mr. Harris said he would compose a 'major moral symphony' that would dwell on the Lincoln era, as significant today as were the trying times of Lincoln's presidency." I can hear it already; and I can hear Mr. Harris telling us what he did to make it moral, and what he did to make it Lincoln, and so on.

My ears are still aching from the Fifth Symphony, in which Mr. Harris told a world that had to know how he had been affected by the heroism of the Russian people. It was broadcast by the N. B. C. Symphony under Frank Black; and I heard it while waiting for Aaron Copland's "Lincoln Portrait." Copland, unlike Harris, is a man of musical talent; one has been aware of his command of his medium even when it produced ugly and repellent works; and for the ballets "Billy the Kid" and "Rodeo" it produced music that was fine-sounding and engaging. The music of "A Lincoln Portrait" is of this style, and could be used for another ballet like "Billy" or "Rodeo"; but in this piece its use and effect are those of incidental music in a play—to create an impressive atmosphere for the words of Lincoln. These words are well chosen; but I squirmed at the business of "He was six feet tall, and he said."

"Double Talk"

Dear Sirs: What kind of doubletalk is my friend James Agee handing us in his review of "Mission to Moscow"? He seems to approve the film's political objectives—except for the Moscow trials, where he shifts into tripletalk—and to detest its moral, aesthetic, and intellectual qualities. It might have occurred to him, in the course of his fancy ruminations, that there is generally a connection between the human and artistic value of a propagandist work of art and the quality of the cause it promotes. If "the deeper effect [of 'Mission to Moscow'] is shame, grief, anaesthesia, the ruin of faith and conscience and the roots of the intelligence"—he certainly throws the language around—one would expect so painfully scrupulous a reviewer to suspect something rotten in the film's thesis. The simple fact is that "Mission to Moscow" is what it is because it has a very dirty job to do.

The bias with which Agee, for all his protestations of political virginity, approaches "Mission to Moscow" emerges clearly when he admits "a painful impotence" to take any stand on the truth or falsity of the Moscow trials—after having written the following extraordinary lines: "It is good to see the conservatives of this country, Great Britain, France, and Poland named even for a fraction of their responsibility for this war. It is good to see the Soviet Union shown as the one nation during the past decade which not only understood fascism but desired to destroy it, and which not only desired peace but had some ideas how it might be preserved. . . ." How can Agee be so agonizingly indecisive about the trials and so blatantly, unqualifiedly cocksure about the even more complex questions of the Soviet Union and war, fascism, and appeasement?

Reluctant as I am to widen the area of Agee's impotence, I must ask him: (1) If Munich appeasement was shameful, as it was, why not also the super-appeasement of the Nazi-Soviet pact? (2) If the conservatives bear heavy responsibility for the war, as they do, why not also the Kremlin, whose pact was the match that touched off the explosion? (3) If the Soviet Union "understood fascism" so well, how does Agee explain (a) the "Social Fascist" theory of the late twenties, and the refusal of the Communists to make a united front with the German Social Democracy against Hitler; (b) Stalin's failure to send decisive aid to Spain, because of respect for the "non-intervention" farce, and his followers' joining with the conservative democrats within the Loyalist government to strangle the developing social revolution, which might have brought victory over Franco; (c) the Communist slogan in 1933, "After Hitler, our turn"—hardly a good example of "understanding" fascism; (d) Molotov's famous remark in 1939 about fascism being "a matter of taste"; (e) the support given to Hitler's peace drives, after he had conquered Europe, by Communist groups throughout the world—up to June 21, 1941, that is?

My friend Agee has a right to whatever opinions he likes, but he also has the obligation to harmonize these opinions one with the other. To leave unresolved the internal contradictions in his criticism, in the hope of somehow pleasing everyone, is doubletalk at a time when clarity on the kind of issue posed by "Mission to Moscow" is of vital importance.

DWIGHT MACDONALD

New York, June 2

Mr. Agee Talks Back

Dear Sirs: It was foolish to venture an opinion on a matter of which I am ignorant; I should have left that to men so conspicuously qualified to have political opinions that they are constantly crushing one another's skulls with the documentary evidence which proves, beyond any doubt, that each of them is right. Hereafter, I will try to stay out of it. Meanwhile I accept my friend Dwight Macdonald's reprimand as well deserved, and will proceed to answer his letter in detail as best I may.

As a matter of gratuitous honesty I must first say that the opinion which so particularly upset Macdonald remains unchanged. But it also remains, as it always was, a purely personal opinion. I will not try to defend it. I don't know enough to, and don't much believe in that sort of knowledge anyway.

But to reply more in detail. I recognize the existence of "a connection between the human and artistic value of a propagandist work of art and the quality of the cause it promotes," but question Macdonald's broad sequiturs. Much that is bad about "Mission to Moscow" is, merely, characteristic of Hollywood, as Macdonald himself would be well qualified to recognize if his political focus did not blur every other. On the other hand, quite a bit of the propagandist drive in "The Birth of a Nation," "Ten Days That Shook the World," "Old and New," Dovschenko's "Frontier" and his "Liberation" was questionable; but that did not prevent these from being great films.

In a highly qualified way, I approved just two of the political objectives of this film.

I neither "admit" nor "profess" an impotence to "take any stand" on the Moscow trials; I merely state it.

Macdonald's more pointed remarks I will find it hard to reply to—impossible, indeed, in the terms in which he makes them, for I am immeasurably (1) less well-informed than he, (2) less interested in being informed, (3) less concerned to have a consistent—or much of any less consistent—political point of view. So I shall have to answer merely as a politically unsophisticated—not to say uninterested—individual.

Speaking very generally to begin with, my remarks about the Soviet understanding of fascism and of the means by which peace might have been preserved were not intended to suggest that the Soviet Union had either total wisdom or a snow-white record. In answering Macdonald's questions in detail, I am not embarrassed, as I might well be if I felt bound either to defend or to attack every action of the Soviet Union, or if I felt Mr. Macdonald's reverence for fact.

1. There are appeasements and appeasements, with more of a difference between them than the word "super." One, I should say, was made without adequate understanding either of the enemy or of the consequences; the other, with a clear understanding of both. Both were shameful if you like, but one was intelligent, the other not.

2. Why not, indeed? But it does seem to me that by that time—for what complex reasons I don't know, nor, probably, does Mr. Macdonald—the Soviet desire for peace had shifted to the simplest and coldest possible desire for self-preservation. Yes, the pact set off the war; and I don't like the chestnut-pulling game, whoever plays at it (not even when my friend Macdonald constructs a device which causes me to do it for him); but I do assume it as inevitably to be expected of any nation—above all, of any nation which has to recognize that it is without a reliable ally on earth; and I feel, as Mr. Macdonald either does not or does not want to show that he does, that this is a secondary form of responsibility, the true weight of which rests again on the conservatives and the fascists.

3. As far as I could explain it at all, I would explain it as the characteristic, expediency-governed twisting and turning which I fear would seem—or perhaps be—necessary to those under the difficult obligation of practicing politics rather than the easier profession of theorizing about them. This does not seem to me incompatible with "understanding" one's enemies; indeed, it seems symptomatic of understanding—which I will grant is not synonymous with infallible probity, wise judgment, or successful conduct. (a) I know nothing of the Social Fascist theory and will attempt neither to explain it nor to learn anything about it. I would suppose that the refusal of a united front with the Social Democrats came more from a reluctance to join with an old set of enemies than from a lack of understanding of the new. (Am I wrong, by the way, in remembering that Trotsky, later on, disparaged the Popular Front; and if so, does this imply that he failed to understand fascism?) (b) Stalin, I always supposed, knew better than to get into a war without allies, and did everything he could for Spain under the treacherous circumstances. Perhaps Stalin's followers did not share Macdonald's opinion that the kind of social revolution which was developing in Spain might have brought victory over Franco. (c) I have no idea of the cause or context of the slogan, but remember a time when Mr. Macdonald and many other leftists felt that fascism was an inevitable late-stage historical process. I would agree that this implies an inadequate understanding of fascism, but I never claimed that that understanding was—or is—absolute, in anybody's mind. (d) During much of 1939 I was not reading the papers, so I first heard this famous remark only a few weeks ago. I have no idea what Molotov meant by it, nor will I bother to find out. I am quite willing to presume that it was a crooked remark or an ironic one; far less willing to imagine that it was a naive one, implying a lack of understanding of fascism. (e) I suppose that the Soviet Union desired peace for the time being, at whatever price to others immediately and to itself ultimately; and was as willing, during that period, to see the democracies defeated as the fascists. That this policy was reversed after the invasion of the Soviet Union is too obvious an irony either to amuse or to embitter me.

I cannot agree that I am under obligation to harmonize my opinions on matters which seem to me disharmonious beyond any sane possibility of harmonizing one's opinions about them: quite to the contrary, in fact. Any doubletalk, to say nothing of tripletalk, in my review or in this letter is open to the interpretation of the reader but is entirely unrealized by the writer. Macdonald is incorrect—as I half-suspect he knows—in saying that I wrote "in the hope of somehow pleasing everyone." That would have been characteristic of depths of political respect which I do not feel, of cowardice which I feel still less, and of a conscious disintegrity which I entirely disclaim. That I pleased anyone surprised me; for on this sort of question, unlike those who are at rest either within some faction or in the non-factionalism I am by no means at rest in, I am incapable of pleasing myself. I agree with Macdonald that clarity on such issues is important; it is important, too, that we learn whether the human predicament is tragic or no worse than a bad cold, and act accordingly; and it would be convenient if clarity on that important question and quite a number less important were possible. As matters stand, though, one man's clarity is another man's poison—or may, which is worse, poison large portions of the human race; and my only point of rest is that though I desire clarity, I would rather be confused by confusion than by false clarity.

The Forgiven Man

Dear Sirs: As a very rich man I suppose I should be gratified by the new tax bill, but I confess that it not only alarms me but poses a very difficult personal problem. I am a married man without dependents, and my income for some years past has been about $1,000,000 annually. As a prudent man I have naturally made it a practice to set aside from income as it accumulated enough to meet my tax obligations. Now, thanks to Congress, I need not hand over to the Treasury the $854,000 I had earmarked for the payment of taxes on 1942 income. Instead, I will only owe $213,500, the payment of which can be spread over two years. Of course, 1943 taxes have to be paid, but these I shall meet out of current income. Consequently I have $640,500 in the bank to use as I like, and my problem is what to do with it. Even for a man of expensive tastes, it is difficult to spend a sum of this size. Of course, you may say why not invest it in war bonds; but this is where prudence and patriotism clash, for the inflationary implications of this tax bill, and other Congressional actions, make investment in fixed-interest-bearing securities quite a gamble. Shall I then hedge against inflation by buying common stocks or speculate in land? Perhaps you or your readers can advise me.

PERPLEXED MILLIONAIRE

New York, June 8

[We often get letters intended for the Nation's Business and we suspect this may be one of them. Nevertheless, we print it because of the light it throws on "the Ruml plan set to three-quarter time," as Representative Dingell described the forgiveness bill. We don't know how to advise our correspondent, but we should like to suggest to the Treasury that it relieve him of part of his worry by applying the rules governing the taxability of forgiven debts. If A owes B $1,000 and B generously tears up his note, that sum becomes part of A's taxable income for that year. Now why should not the $640,500 which our "perplexed millionaire" owed the Treasury and now will be excused from paying be added to his 1943 income? That would reduce his problem to a more manageable size, while the application of the same rule to all income-tax payers would produce for the public purse a considerable proportion of the extra $16 billion it needs this year.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Congratulations!

The Shape of Things

ONCE AGAIN THE COAL FIELDS ARE IDLE, and once again the country faces the prospect of almost total disruption of war production should the dispute last more than a week or two. It would be hard to acquit the various government agencies which have sought to deal with the situation of all responsibility, but the chief blame rests squarely on the shoulders of John L. Lewis. From the beginning his attitude has been: "Meet my demands or else." By his refusal to recognize the jurisdiction of the War Labor Board, by his insistence on negotiating with the strike weapon in hand and thereby violating the pledge he had given in common with other labor leaders, by his openly expressed determination to smash the Little Steel order, he created a situation in which the government could only satisfy his demands by abdicating its authority. In their dissenting opinion on the "portal-to-portal" issue the labor members of the WLB accuse the majority of resorting to a "technical and narrow interpretation" of their powers under the President's directive. Nevertheless, the argument that the proposed flat-rate compensation for travel time would not remove the admitted inequalities of the face-to-face system is difficult to controvert. Nor can it be gainsaid that miners' pay on a six-day-week basis compares so favorably with that in many other industries that an increase under any formula would make it hard to refuse a general upward revision of wages.

UNDER LEWIS'S LEADERSHIP THE U. M. W. HAS been brought to a point where it is defying both public opinion and the government so flagrantly that the Administration is bound to use all means of breaking the strike. Even so, we still think that the War Labor Disputes Bill, which makes Lewis's intransigence an excuse for undermining the rights of all unions, should be vetoed. We realize, nevertheless, that it would require tremendous courage on the part of the President to refuse to sign. For a veto would leave him wide open to attack on the ground that he had met a threat to the national safety by thrusting aside a proffered weapon to withstand it. reaches its readers—will, in fact, prove effective in opening up the mines remains to be seen. Possibly the strike might be broken by seizure of the U. M. W.'s funds, but we expect Mr. Lewis would be able to muster enough legal talent to prevent this and to keep himself out of jail. A more hopeful procedure, we believe, would be for the government to take over the mines—not on paper, as it has already done, but by leasing them for the duration. The miners would then feel that they were working directly for the government and were no longer creating private profits. In such circumstances the President would be in a much better position to insist that they disregard the orders of John L. Lewis.

AS A STATESMAN SIR ARCHIBALD WAVELL, who is to take office as Viceroy of India next October, is an unknown quantity, but at least he has no political record of the kind that would damn him from the outset. This is more than can be said for a number of the men who had been mentioned as possibles for the appointment. Wavell has been a soldier all his life, and many good authorities think he is among Britain's greatest. His campaign in Libya and his direction of the successful conquest of Ethiopia have been overshadowed by more recent events in Africa, but these operations will be remembered in history as brilliant examples of brick-making without straw. Although Wavell is the first military man ever to be appointed viceroy, the breaking of precedents can be justified by the fact that strategic insight is a necessity for the chief executive of a country so close to the war as is India. And his choice may be taken as a plain indication that the British government still thinks that victory comes first and Indian independence second. Certainly, Indian nationalists who believe that this order should be reversed declare that the appointment means no change in British policy. We hope that Wavell will prove this pessimism premature. The advent of a new viceroy is always an opportunity for an amnesty, and with Gandhi and Nehru out of jail it would become possible to reopen negotiations.

ELMER DAVIS'S REMARKS ABOUT THE WAY Washington news is handled by reporters and their bosses may have precipitated the action of the House in abolishing the domestic activities of the Office of War Information; but the way in which that speech was used by Senator Styles Bridges and by Representatives Short and Starnes make it clear that anything Davis might have said would have been seized upon as a stick with which to beat the Administration. Bridges accused Davis of wanting to "silence the nation's press"; Short and Starnes brought up the name of Goebbels. (Arthur Krock meanwhile put in his two cents' worth of spleen by saying that Davis had become merely a yes-man for the Administration—Krock himself being chief no-man.) In the same off-with-their heads session, the House voted to prohibit continuance of the OPA's food-subsidy program; it also stipulated that all price-policy officials should have at least five years of actual business experience—no wonder the Chamber of Commerce raised its voice in fulsome praise next day. We hope the Senate will temper the rash actions of the House on these issues, though its own action directing the liquidation of the National Resources Planning Board is not encouraging. None of these extravagant performances are motivated, we may be sure, by a desire to save money or avert inflation or preserve a free press. The right is on a rampage. That being so, a more cautious man than Davis might have deferred his free speech—which a bureaucrat is entitled to—until after the vote on OWI appropriations. But we can't help admiring him for not refusing to cross Bridges.

THE HOUSE FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE took a notable step toward prevention of World War III when it unexpectedly adopted the Fulbright resolution pledging the support of Congress for "appropriate international machinery with power adequate to establish and maintain a just and lasting peace." While the Fulbright resolution lacks the clarity of the Ball-Burton-Hatch-Hill resolution now pending in the Senate, it embodies the essentials of post-war organization. Passage of the resolution by the House should have a most salutary effect abroad. For it makes clear that the United States has no intention of relapsing into the kind of pre-war isolationism that was marked by the Neutrality Act. The fact that staunch isolationists like Hamilton Fish and John M. Vorys approved the resolution indicates that much ground has been won. While we shall doubtless find many of these isolationists opposing all specific plans for post-war organization, their assent to the general principle of American participation in world affairs suggests that they are aware of the present temper of public opinion as expressed in the opinion polls. The situation in the Senate, where the Ball-Burton-Hatch-Hill resolution has been held up for months, is much less satisfactory. Possibly because Senators only come up for reelection once in six years, isolationism still appears to have considerable influence in the upper chamber. But there is at least a fighting chance that in an effort to keep the House from stealing the show, the Senate will feel compelled to go that body one better and adopt the Ball resolution.

ALMOST A FULL YEAR HAS PASSED SINCE Donald M. Nelson promised to appoint two labor vice-chairmen to the War Production Board. The promise was made when Ferdinand Eberstadt and the Army-Navy Munitions Board were about to take over the WPB; the promise has finally been kept at a time when the Byrnes-Baruch-Eberstadt combination is again on the verge of engulfing the WPB. Clinton S. Golden, of the United Steel Workers, is to be vice-chairman for man-power liaison and at the same time vice-chairman of the War Manpower Commission in charge of labor relations. We know his great ability and applaud his selection. Joseph B. Keenan, former secretary of the Chicago Federation of Labor, is to be vice-chairman of the WPB in charge of the labor-production division. We note with amusement that Nelson unctuously makes much of the fact that they will go on government salary and break off their union connections; most of his business recruits are still drawing salary from the home office. More important than that, however, is the fact that we see no evidence that either Golden or Keenan will give labor a voice in production problems. Golden's duties are to be confined to man-power liaison, though he knows more about production problems than most business men. Keenan, who made a good record under Sidney Hillman in the OPM, is assigned to deal with problems of "worker productivity." Though some of the most fruitful ideas of the war program first came from labor, there is every indication that its representatives at the WPB are to be kept out of management's production counsels.

Czar or Subsidies

OPPONENTS of the Administration have apparently decided to take advantage of bad weather and the exceptional food requirements of war time to make as much political capital as possible out of the food shortage. Their cry at the moment is for a "food czar" with full control over production, processing, distribution, and pricing of food. On the surface, the demand seems not unreasonable. Greater coordination and centralization of authority are usually necessary in war time. Mr. Davis's powers, though great, are by no means absolute. He does not have the authority, for example, to allow farm prices to skyrocket, even though it may be argued that a sharp increase in agricultural prices would certainly bring increased production. He does not have the power to reduce army or lend-lease allotments, although such a reduction would certainly mean more food for civilians. He cannot compel men to work on farms if they prefer the high wages of the war plants. The advocates of a "food czar" probably have no desire to upset our man-power or lend-lease arrangements. Their one interest is in getting higher prices for farm products, and their demand for an over-all food authority is largely a cloak for a drive against the existing price controls. The larger interests of a balanced war-production program have been wholly overlooked.

The farm bloc particularly has been angered by the proposed rollbacks in food prices, and it has taken advantage of the squeeze caused by the rollback to parade alleged instances in which farmers are not meeting the costs of production. That the opposition to the rollback is political rather than economic is made clear by the farm bloc's antagonism to a system of subsidies which would guarantee the farmer full costs of production plus a reasonable profit. Fortunately, the opponents of the subsidies have not been able to think up an effective argument against them. Protests that the subsidies would be "inflationary" carry little conviction from a group that only a few weeks ago was urging passage of the Pace bill to include farm labor costs in parity prices. The truth is that subsidies offer the one method by which the existing inflationary spiral can be controlled while Congress procrastinates in its task of increasing taxes sufficiently to mop up excess buying power. As the President pointed out at his press conference last week, it is possible to correct an inequity through the payment of a subsidy without giving new impetus to the inflationary spiral. A boost in farm prices, on the other hand, would be immediately reflected in an increase in the cost of living, thus creating a demand for higher wages and salaries and raising the prices of the things the farmer must buy. Subsidies also have the advantage of flexibility. They can be used to stimulate the production of nutritious foods, such as soy beans and peanuts, which might otherwise be neglected. Properly administered, subsidies also may be used as a weapon to combat the black market. The OPA can make certain that no subsidies are paid to anyone who has in any way aided black market operations.

In view of Britain's success with food subsidies in combating inflation the President and Price Administrator Prentiss Brown are to be commended for sticking to their guns. As a result of their tenacity it begins to look for the first time in months as if the OPA had the price situation reasonably well in hand. But it must be recognized that they are going to have a tough job holding their position for, while repelling a frontal attack from Capitol Hill, they also have to deal with sniping from the rear. Encouraged by the demand for a "food czar," Mr. Chester Davis has presented an ultimatum demanding full power over price and rationing policies for his War Food Administration. He also insists that he must deal directly with the President instead of with the Office of Economic Stabilization as at present.

The grant of such sweeping powers to Mr. Davis would be popular with the farmers—or at least with the farm lobby—but we have grave doubts whether it would be in the interests of the consumers. True, he has let it be known that he is not wholly opposed to subsidies, but he seems to accept the Farm Bureau's view that prices must go up. Yet it is in the food price sector that the anti-inflationary front is already cracking, and if this gives way the line cannot be held.

British Labor Marks Time

THE end of its most controversial conference since the war started sees the British Labor Party signaling "no change." By a large majority it voted for continuance of the party truce in the interests of national unity; by a rather smaller one it rejected the view that either national or working-class unity would be promoted by accepting the affiliation of the Communist Party. These were the two major issues debated, and the conclusions reached were in accordance with informed forecasts. A more open and exciting contest was that between Arthur Greenwood and Herbert Morrison for the treasurership of the party. Greenwood won by a substantial but not overwhelming majority.

Some American commentators have interpreted this duel as one between right and left, with the victory going to the left. Actually both men can be described as right center, and there are no very serious differences between them either on long-range policy or short-range tactics. Both believe in the gradual approach to socialism; both favor the continuance of the party truce and the exclusion of the Communists. On the other hand, the rivalry between them is not purely personal, although personal factors do enter. Rather it represents a structural fissure in the party which is scarcely visible when Labor is in opposition but is likely to gape widely when Labor again takes office.

The British Labor Party is really a federation in which the two chief components are the national trade unions and the local labor parties. The trade-union element is both the strength and the weakness of the organization. It supplies the mass backing and much of the financial support, but the individual members of the local parties do most of the practical work. Thanks to the voting weight they exercise and their monetary resources, the trade unions in a great many of the most promising constituencies have the last word on Parliamentary nominees, and all too often they use this as a means of pensioning off elderly officials. The result has been to raise the average age and lower the mental caliber of the Parliamentary Labor Party. More important than this, however, is the fact that trade unions, as professional bodies, tend inevitably to put their special group interests first. During the war, it is true, they have consciously resisted this temptation and have made victory their foremost object. But in times of peace a measure which infringes on some vested trade-union interest may be strenuously fought even though it is in accord with the Labor Party program.

Arthur Greenwood, although not a union official, has always been close to the big trade unions. Morrison, on the other hand, owes his place in the party to the way in which he built it up in the London area, where owing to the multiplicity of trades no one union predominates. Of the two, he is perhaps the more aware of the fact that if ever labor is to win full power it must broaden its base and become less of a "class" party in the old sense. In a series of remarkable speeches he has made during the past few months, the keynote of which has been the paramountcy of the consumer in the promotion of economic welfare, he has attacked the evils of sectionalism, monopoly, and restriction in a manner which may well have irked some of his trade-union colleagues. "Labor," he said in one of these addresses, "must be more in practice than a party of social services and wage standards. . . . The one general principle that has some meaning and can be defended is that the interest of the community, and not the interest of this or that group in industry or elsewhere, must decide.

There is great danger that after the war Churchill's prestige will sweep the Conservatives back into power on a victory flood tide and that, as Reinhold Niebuhr suggests elsewhere in this issue, the war-time promises of social and economic reform will be forgotten. This is why some of the most vigorous members of the Labor Party have urged that the political truce should be ended now. Lack of activity and the necessity of maintaining the status quo by not fighting by-elections is, they contend, sapping the party's energy and organization. And, after the war, they fear, Churchill will be in a position to force them into a continued coalition on take-it-or-leave-it terms. These factors cannot be lightly dismissed but the political truce cannot be broken without breaking up the national government—a step which would almost certainly prove a costly blunder. It would force Churchill to seek a new mandate at a general election with the Conservatives appearing as the embodiment of the national will to victory and Labor as pursuers of sectional ends.

Labor will not win power by such tactics but rather by making itself a vehicle for the widespread though not fully articulated demand in Britain for a new social order. Herbert Morrison, we believe, has grasped that truth and alone among the leaders of British Labor he is hammering out a far-sighted policy. That is why we regret his defeat by Greenwood who, despite his ability and charm, no longer seems to possess the dynamics of leadership. Marking time in the electoral field is one thing but British Labor cannot afford to stick in the mental rut into which it fell after the downfall of the Labor government in 1931.

Expediency in Argentina

BY FRED KIRCHWEY

THE action of the State Department in recognizing the military government in Argentina was a dubious move from every point of view. It was not, one must admit, without precedent. Although our government has sometimes withheld recognition from regimes which came to power through unconstitutional means, it has sometimes, as recently in the case of Panama, established relations with them promptly and without asking embarrassing questions. In other words, we have kept the principle of constitutionality on ice to be used when convenient—turning principle itself into an instrument of expediency.

So there's no use scolding the Administration for forgetting, in the case of Argentina, its theoretical disapproval of governments born of rebellion. The problem is a different one. The problem is to decide whether, since expediency is to be our guide whichever course we follow, the quick recognition of the Ramirez dictatorship was a wise move. The Nation believed, and said at the time of the coup, that the State Department would do well to insist upon a constitutional regime which could be counted upon to adopt an honest, anti-Axis foreign policy. We pointed out that the reactionary character of the new government offered little reason to expect that Argentina would become a full, dues-paying member of the anti-Axis coalition.

Now, too late, Washington is beginning to discover facts that were evident from the moment the Ramirez junta took power. Not only has Ramirez given no sign of anti-Axis sentiment, but suspicion is gaining ground that the coup was actually engineered by a pro-Nazi military group which believed that Patron Costas, Castillo's hand-picked successor, might, when elected, favor closer relations with the United States. Whether this turns out to be the case or not, it is obvious that the new regime is playing a cagy game, proclaiming solidarity with the other Americas while announcing as its international policy a new variety of "true" neutrality.

Argentina's military men and other nationalist elements have watched with alarm and natural resentment the rearming of its neighbors, particularly Brazil, with American lend-lease material. If the new government can get a share of this valuable booty and at the same time maintain its happy intimacy with the Axis powers, the hopes of the reactionaries will be wholly realized. Every gesture so far made must be taken as a hopeful bid for material aid from the United States. But in this gamble the Ramirez regime stands to lose. Recognition is one thing; guns and planes and tanks are more precious commodities, and our government is not likely to hand them out for anything less than a break with the Axis.

Since this is so, one cannot exclude the possibility that a break may come. If its present tactics should prove unsuccessful, Argentina, also applying the test of expediency, might decide that a share of lend-lease material was worth the formal severing of relations with Germany and Italy. It is even conceivable that Hitler might connive in such a move, believing that a well-armed, powerful pro-Axis state in South America could be of greater help, even in the absence of formal relations, than a state ostracized by the rest of the hemisphere and deprived of access to the great arsenal to the north.

This is speculation; but it is worth indulging in if only that we may prepare ourselves mentally for a situation which would hold almost as many chances of trouble for the United States and the Allied cause as the present one. If Argentina should break off relations with the Axis, the activities of German and Italian diplomatic agents would be taken over, as in other Latin American countries, by the Phalanx and Franco's embassies and consulates. Spain's fascist government has maintained particularly close ties with Argentina, with which it recently signed a new trade pact; the two reactionary regimes share an open sympathy for the Axis, a hatred of democracy, a partiality for political clericalism; and the agents of the Phalanx are solidly established in Argentina's social and business life. Nothing known about the new regime suggests that this situation will change.

Meanwhile, a reactionary gang of generals and admirals is busy clamping its control over the whole of Argentina. Not only has Congress been abrogated; the elected governments of the states are being forcibly thrown out and supplanted by governors appointed by Ramirez—in one case by a known and active pro-Nazi. The government has also called off the Presidential election scheduled for September, and has made the meaning of this action doubly clear by announcing that the word "provisional" no longer applies to a regime which has been approved by the Supreme Court and recognized by foreign countries. The last vestiges of constitutional rule, with which even Castillo dared not tamper, are being wiped out. Washington's misguided haste in giving diplomatic sanction to the new regime must have greatly enhanced its prestige, both at home and among the other Latin American republics. On the other hand, a delay in recognizing Ramirez, for which we could have found even nobler precedents than for recognition, would have created doubt everywhere, encouraged honest democrats and pro-Ally elements in Argentina to force a change of policy or another change of government, and announced to the world our interest in acts rather than words.

It took us sixteen years to decide to recognize the Soviet government, which had been established by a people's revolution; we might profitably have waited sixteen days to recognize the reactionary government of Argentina, set up by a military coup.

How Weiner Was Tractored Out

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, June 18

I HAVE before me a pamphlet published by one of the termite outfits still covertly operating despite the war. The pamphlet is called "Famine in America—Home Grown by the Farmers from Union Square." It works back from the farm-machinery question through the League for Industrial Democracy to a long list of Jewish names and the usual paranoid hints at a worldwide conspiracy. I open it to a speech by Shafer of Michigan shrewdly appealing to interests threatened by the war effort. "If the free press of America," Shafer said, "is in danger—and it is—it is Weiner who is to blame. It is Weiner who advocated an 80 per cent slash in newsprint. . . . If prohibition creeps into America through the back door—with all the attendant evils of gangs, murder, and poison liquor—Weiner is to blame, with his program for a 99 per cent slash in distilled liquor. . . . It was Weiner, Russian-born Wall Street lawyer, who slashed farm-production machinery 70 per cent without rhyme, reason, or authority."

This speech is only one of the more extreme examples of the attacks made in Congress upon Joseph Weiner, who, as I explained last week, has just been elbowed out of the War Production Board by Donald M. Nelson after two years as head of civilian supply in the successive alphabet war agencies. Perhaps Weiner was not "broad-gauged" enough—to borrow Nelson's phrase—to understand that it was as important to keep in the good graces of the distillers as to provide alcohol for smokeless powder and synthetic rubber. The distillers, however, are now turning out industrial alcohol for war, whether they like it or not. The farm-equipment manufacturers, allied as they were with the farm bloc, proved more powerful. They objected, as did every other civilian industry, to having their production cut after Pearl Harbor. The Big Seven in the industry protested against the concentration order which handed over curtailed production schedules to the smaller companies and cleared the decks of the big ones for war work.

"There was, of course, tremendous pressure from the armed services to get everything they wanted," Senator Truman of Missouri said to Weiner at the Truman committee hearings on farm equipment last January. ". . . I am morally certain that there was not any pressure group down there pounding you on every side to get this farm machinery for the farmer." This is one of the few cases in which Senator Truman's moral certainties do not survive empiric test. The big farm-equipment companies and the farm bloc have succeeded in recent months in deceiving the Truman committee, getting authority over farm equipment shifted from the WPB to the Department of Agriculture, and obtaining constant upward revision in their steel allocations. On June 9 Nelson announced that in the year beginning July 1 the farm-equipment companies would be allowed to produce 80 per cent of the 1940 level, and gave them a preliminary allocation of 900,000 tons of steel. He also announced that concentration of production would be abandoned.

Here are the facts of the farm-equipment story. The years 1937, 1940, 1941, and 1942—despite Pearl Harbor—were the four years of highest farm-machinery sales since the First World War. Farmers entered 1943 with the greatest aggregate quantity of machinery in history. A curtailment program went into effect on November 1, 1942. In July of that year, after considerable prodding, the farm-equipment branch of the WPB, a branch dominated—typically—by the big manufacturers, had recommended that in the twelve months beginning November 1 production be permitted at 50 per cent of the 1940 level. Their opposite numbers in the Department of Agriculture agreed, but Secretary Wickard, as chairman of the Food Requirements Committee, cut this to 38 per cent. The Civilian Supply Branch of the WPB recommended 27.6 per cent for the reason, among others, that liberal appeals methods generally permit production 20 to 25 per cent in excess of quotas. The Army-Navy Munitions Board, through Ferdinand Eberstadt, its chairman at the time, urged a deeper cut because of the urgent need for raw materials. As a result, Weiner was instructed to cut farther. His final recommendation of 23 per cent was approved by the all-powerful Requirements Committee, on which the armed services are represented, but in September that body cut the farm-equipment program again, allocating to it only 120,000 tons of steel instead of the 176,000 tons called for by the 23 per cent program. Weiner at this point appealed and got the original allocation restored. Output of repair parts was permitted at 145 per cent of the 1940 level. It was felt that with this generous allowance for repair parts and the large stock of machinery on hand, we should have ample equipment with which to meet food goals.

In the summer of 1942, while the industry was still going full blast on civilian work, it had a huge backlog of unfilled war orders, most of them on the books of the large companies. Only the Big Seven can make tractors and combines, but the Labor Production Division of the WPB and Weiner's Office of Civilian Supply proposed in July that production of other farm machinery be concentrated in the smaller plants. In August both Lieutenant General Somervell, chief of the Services of Supply, and Under Secretary of War Patterson urged Nelson to put Weiner's concentration program into effect as quickly as possible. So did the War Manpower Commission. The industry balked, and the WPB balked with it, but a modified program was finally adopted in October. Ever since, there has been retreat, one concession following another. "Farm equipment," the Wall Street Journal says today, "is being fixed by politics." And by big business.

In the retreat Weiner was left to become the goat of industry and the farm bloc. The Shafer type of attack upon him began in Congress in December. When the Truman committee looked into the situation, with malice aforethought, in January, it did not summon Patterson, Somervell, Eberstadt, or Nelson. Eberstadt let the committee know privately that he would increase the allotment for farm machinery before the hearings, and Nelson announced an increased allocation the day after the Truman report was rushed into print. The committee, which praised Weiner last June for "advocating an all-out effort," was shamefully unfair to him in its farm-machinery report in January. Previously suspicious of dollar-a-year men, it criticized Weiner for not heeding the advice of the personnel of the Farm Machinery and Equipment Branch, "drawn in large part from the industry, having a wealth of experience gathered over a long period of time in planning an industry program under conditions free from governmental restriction"—a new note in Truman reports. No one would have gathered from that report that the farm-machinery branch of Weiner's Civilian Supply Division was headed and staffed by farm-born and -bred agricultural experts. While Weiner was being attacked in Congress as a "Russian-born Wall Street lawyer," no one pointed out that William Russell, who drew up the farm-equipment report for the Truman committee, was formerly with Cravath, de Gersdorff, Swaine, and Wood, Wall Street's most famous firm of corporation lawyers. Weiner has been trampled out by the Big Seven, and the price will be paid in battle. Though the armed forces are still short of steel, International Harvester and its allies will probably get 1,000,000 tons in the next twelve months. Ce n'est pas la guerre.

Strategy for Negroes

BY JAMES BOYD

[Convinced that Negro-white relations cannot be substantially improved solely by protesting against individual cases of discrimination, we have undertaken to give our readers a consideration of the deeper problems involved. To get at the roots of the matter it is not enough merely to present the views for which The Nation has always stood, to reiterate, that is, our traditional advocacy of racial equality. Neither is anything to be gained by publishing the well-known views of professional Southern hate-mongers. Our purpose in printing the following article, with which we sharply disagree at many points, is to demonstrate the magnitude of the problem by presenting it through the eyes of an enlightened and sympathetic Southerner. Whatever we and the majority of our readers may feel about the urgency of effecting complete racial equality, it is vital to know the gap that must be bridged between our position and that of even the most advanced Southern liberals. Mr. Boyd's article is to be followed in our next issue by the views of a liberal Negro writer who finds the Boyd approach no longer convincing.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

RECENTLY A. Philip Randolph, president of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, was quoted by PM as having said that the Ku Klux Klan was behind John Temple Graves of the Birmingham Age-Herald and Virginius Dabney of the Richmond Times-Dispatch. Asked by the present writer to comment on this report, Mr. Randolph declared that he had said rather than the two expressed the spirit of the Klan. This distinction is minor. Two outstanding Southern liberals have been classed with the Klan by one of the most prominent Negroes in America. It is not a unique incident: there have recently been numerous Negro attacks on liberals, North and South.

So general, in fact, on the part of Negroes is this new attitude toward both white and Negro liberalism that it carries the mark of deliberate strategy. If it is strategy, then it should be based on what is called in military parlance an "estimate of the situation." No strategy is likely to be effective that does not first weigh the elements for and against its success. But so far as is known, this estimate has not been made by the Negroes who are practicing the strategy. Before discussing the prospects of their campaign then, it will be worth while to make that estimate, taking into account the basic factors which affect the Negro's position in American society.

Most rudimentary of those factors is man's primitive antagonism to the strange. The alien cast up on the beach is killed because his color, speech, smell are different. The impulse is rooted in nature's urge to eliminate the atypical from her breeding program and must therefore be reckoned with in all contacts between physically different races, however tragically misapplied. When instead of the solitary castaway great numbers of aliens are involved, this primitive instinct against the strange is powerfully reinforced by a group instinct to defend the cultural heritage. Probably the strongest motive behind this attitude is the determination of a race to keep its children like itself. It is characteristic of all races to be uneasy lest the succeeding generation fall away from the parents' precious standards. A threat to change children from replicas of ourselves into beings of a different kind stirs us to fierce resistance. This is true even though the alien host was deliberately imported, as were both the Negroes in the South and the Orientals on the West Coast.

Lastly, wherever there is a history of violence and outrage between physically different races, it is obvious that the prejudices will be intensified on both sides. The victim seeks his vicarious revenge, and the perpetrator seeks reasons to explain and justify his crimes.

And, of course, when a difference in economic levels makes one group a supposed threat to the other's standard of living, all prejudices are exacerbated. In the case of the Negro the threat has been met by wage and job discrimination. This keeps large sections of the Negro population poor, ignorant, and lacking in ambition. These attributes are then cited as reasons for discrimination. The answer is obviously that if the Negro is actually inferior, discrimination is superfluous: he will not be able to compete.

All the factors so far mentioned affect the relations of races in general and of the many racial groups within this country. But in the case of the Negro, added to all these considerations is another circumstance, apparently unique in history, that utterly overshadows them. The Negro is an ex-slave who carries the mark of his former status in his pigmentation. It is the status rather than the color which is the key to his present position. An Apache, for example, is as dark as the average Negro, but a white American would feel no chagrin at finding an Apache in his ancestry. For the Indian was not a slave.

That this susceptibility to enslavement is a permanent characteristic, that the stigma is "real" or deserved, is contrary to the teachings of history, philosophy, religion, and ethnology. Races and cultures rise and fall more slowly than individual families but in the same fashion.

Certainly, to discuss the issue on its lowest plane, many of the bound-boys, indentured servants, and transported felons who arrived in this country were as much "slaves" as the Negro. Certainly, too, the development of both races in this country shows that talent and ability are latent in slaves of any color. It may well be that a white man's emigrant ancestors were substantially slaves, economic or penal. But it is the white man's good fortune that the fact cannot be determined by his appearance.

We have, then, a racial group that while by no means "foreign" is nevertheless not generally accepted either as a social or an economic equal. Many of this race "pass" as whites, but unless a Negro's color is light enough to permit this he remains under the shadow of his heritage. Nothing could be more natural, more creditable to the Negro's spirit, than the determination to escape this shadow, to better himself, to obtain an opportunity equal to that of other men. It is impossible to think of any reason whatever against this honorable desire. Certainly, therefore, the Negro is justified in having some plan of action, some notion of what he is after and of what is the best way to go about getting it.

GRADUALISM OR EXPLOSION?

Roughly two lines of strategy are open to Negro leaders. But they cannot, as they seem to be trying to do now, follow both lines simultaneously. They must choose and choose soon. Their choice would logically be determined by their theory of history. If they are of the gradualist school, the procedure would be to exact, by a combination of persuasion and pressure, as much as the white man in the present state of the two races is willing to concede. That is the method by which peoples and classes, under the slowly developing democratic system, have in the past won a measure of justice. It is a method which never achieves perfect justice and indeed does not present, even theoretically, any perfect state toward which the democrat can strive. Since there is no compelling end, there is nothing to justify the means. The means must justify themselves; they must, however compromised and inadequate, at least represent amelioration of present ills by methods generally agreed on and protected by law. Under democracy there are some things which cannot legally be done to a Negro or any other man. Under a total government, where any policy may be promoted and defended as being in the interest of a promised Utopia, there is nothing which cannot be done. The Negro has under democracy a certain minimum protection, pitiable though it may be, and historically these minimum rights of oppressed classes in a democracy do tend to expand toward equality.

That this protection, however limited, is not, within its frame, negligible may be illustrated by the fact that Negro Communists who obstructed our war effort before Germany's attack on Russia are alive and active today, whereas similar activity in their spiritual fatherland or any other total state would long ago have brought their liquidation. In the same way the Communist theater in London continued to give plays strongly and no doubt justly critical of the government during the German air raids. The British government has never attempted to achieve, or even had any picture of, a perfect state. But by compromise, concession, belated adaptation, and above all by honorable adherence to such few legal principles as it did admit, it has managed to exist without internal violence since the time of Cromwell. Therefore it was not disturbed by the Marxist theater, nor, with its principles, would it have been easy for it to act if it had been.

So much for democracy and its limitations and its gradualisms. The other theory of history is, of course, the explosive: it holds that all progress, so-called, is produced by fracturing a social mold—or at least by attempts to fracture it. In the case of the American Negro it would have to be the second method. He has not the military strength to challenge the white man. And it is doubtful whether he can get much help. No honest American can be happy about the Negro's present lot or anything but contemptuous of the whites who would worsen or even stabilize it. But though Americans fought once to free the Negro from slavery, they will hardly fight again over the precise status of a race which in the seventy years since it was freed has shown an advance unparalleled in cultural history and which now occupies positions of esteem in the arts and in some branches of learning, of rank in the army, and of influence in Congress. In this picture, it is true, there are plenty of gaps and inadequacies to move a well-disposed white man to indignation and to further effort, but they are not sufficient, taken in their historical setting, to move him to a crusade. Except for problematical Communist support, the Negro would fight alone.

Even Communist support cannot be greatly relied on. Communism is prevalent among the Negro intelligentsia, and its characteristic tactics of provocation and disruption, pursued long after they have ceased to be of service to Russia, may be seen in occasional manufactured incidents and in the Negro's studied attitude of hostility to all whites in some localities. But numerically it is weak, and its leadership has neither the quality nor the native air required to move Americans.

Above all, Soviet Russia, following the course indicated by the dissolution of the Comintern, is almost sure to become more nationalistic, particularly if victorious. In that case it will abandon its local efforts here for the sake of the more strictly national advantages which presumably we shall be able to offer after the war. But even if it were intent on creating for itself a favorable condition of chaos here, it probably would discover that the Negro, for several reasons, was not a suitable agent for the purpose.

The Negro, then, would have to fight alone, and the most the explosivist could hope for would be race warfare that could not succeed but that, when it burnt itself out, would so move the whites to shame by its record of brutality that the Negro's lot would be ameliorated.

Those who determine the Negro's strategy at this point in our history will have to make the choice. They cannot benefit from both explosion and adaptation. The temptation to produce an explosion is immense. It is easy; the luxury of passion is a grateful one; morally there is justification—the Negro's wrongs are bitter—intellectually there is every reason for claiming the abolition of all distinction. But the real question is whether an explosion will retard or accelerate the Negro's progress. We can try to guess the answer by examining the Civil War, the only departure from gradualism in our internal affairs. The Negro's advance since then has been remarkable, but if we look at the history of the Negro in other countries where slavery was abolished, the long-run advantage of the Civil War seems more dubious. Far from being irrepressible, the conflict now seems to have been synthetically manufactured over an issue that was in danger of being solved peacefully, as it was solved in the British Empire, by economics and the moral sense of mankind.

As it was, to give the ex-slave the vote overnight and at the same time disfranchise the white, while defensible on the grounds of abstract justice or of punishment for rebellion, did in practice so far exceed the cultural limits of both races then that reaction was inevitable. Its paralyzing effect on Southern political intelligence is only too well known. There is less recognition of how profoundly the experience undermined the Negro's confidence in the white man's method of government and also in his own capacity. With no preparation he was raised to some of the highest offices in the state. Almost as swiftly he was deposed and disfranchised. What had been done without forethought was undone by violence at the polls. Inevitably such a sequence poisoned the whole atmosphere of transition.

Nor did the evil consequences of this violent rupture cease with those directly affected. It has been a further misfortune to the nation that a feeling of remorse for its part in Reconstruction has moved the North to condone Southern intransigence and even to regard it with a certain affectionate amusement. No one can demonstrate that a different approach to the problem would have had happier results, but certainly no other method could have been worse.

The Civil War, then, so far as its main issue was concerned, could show for its masses of dead men, of griefs and hatreds, only the bare abolition of chattel servitude. Beyond question, if there was no other solution, the war had to be fought and the curse and shame destroyed. But if a peaceful solution had been worked out, as was done everywhere else, Negro and white man would both be farther advanced in brotherhood today.

By the same token, if violence can advance his cause now, the Negro is justified in not stopping short of it, and, of course, he is justified in denouncing those who counsel moderation. But he should be sure of his strategy and realistic about where his present technique is leading him. As matters are developing, the attitude of some leaders and of most Negro newspapers, intentionally or not, is tending to produce a race war. If this attitude is intentional and if it is adopted by the Negro people, it will have to be justified by the results. If it is not intentional and the war occurs as a sort of mass accident, the tragedy will be absolute.

WASTED ASSETS

Meanwhile, the possible advantages of a campaign of gradualism are being frittered away. There is no space to give details. But a characteristic example may be found in a recent story by Richard Wright in Harper's Magazine. Wright tells how the experimental animals in a laboratory were accidentally let out of their cages by the Negro attendants, who then to avoid detection put them back indiscriminately. According to the author, the change was never noted by the scientists. The story is marked by infantile glee at the triumph over white stupidity. Such glee is characteristic of an oppressed people's attitude toward its oppressors, but in a racial leader one would expect some recognition that faithfulness to his trust is an asset in the Negro's struggle. If the Negro can be persuaded by his leaders that deceit and unfaithfulness are commendable, his economic value is reduced and so is his power to improve his status.

The oppressed are always tempted to make an idol and scapegoat of their wrongs. But the imposing rise of the American Negro has been effected by those members of the race, great and humble, who resisted that enticing by-path. It is precisely because they did not resent their wrongs as much as they might justly have done that they have made the Negro a symbol of beauty and dignity among us.

This is no place to sentimentalize over the Negro's virtues. And of all substitutes for justice, sentimentality is the most offensive. But since some of those virtues, at least, are of strategic value, it is permissible for the Negro to count them in planning his campaign. His good manners are notable and have saved large areas of this country from savagery. A magistrate of long experience recently remarked, for instance, that Negroes were the only gentlemen in New York. The Negro's skill with children, with the sick, and with animals is a by-word among us. His religious feeling has brought a sense of mystery, love, and reverence to Americans.

If a campaign of gradualism is decided on as the most promising, these recognized assets should not be wasted in a crusade for social acceptance; efforts should be concentrated on the economic front. Here the enemy is weakest; here the Negro's friends are most numerous. Not many Americans deny that a Negro ought by rights to have a job and pay suited to his skill. With economic betterment, social amelioration is bound to follow; but if the Negro reverses the process and attacks on the social front, he is likely to alienate many who would normally stand with him in his economic campaign.

Above all, let him remember how slowly history moves and that all must accept responsibility for their part in it. He is freer now, but still not so free as the white man.

How fast and how far he travels toward equal freedom will be determined not by his demands but by his brains and character.

Meanwhile, he needs proved friends and friends of practical experience. Can he afford to discard those white Southerners who, not in the comfortable isolation enjoyed by more distant idealists but in daily contact with the problem, have devoted themselves to attacking the Negro's natural enemies?

Decline of the Sea Wolves

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

THE Battle of the Atlantic seems to be at last turning in our favor; the U-boat is less of a threat at the moment than at any other time since the fall of France. A few figures will show the gains of recent months. In March American shipyards alone completed 1,510,000 tons of new ships. In the same month the Germans claimed the destruction of 851,000 tons. For April the comparable figures were 1,600,000 and 415,000 tons. In May, when American yards finished a stupendous total of 1,780,000 tons of new shipping, German claims went down to 372,000 tons. Actual sinkings may have been still less, for the Nazis, never modest about the feats of their submarines, included an inexplicable 90,000 tons at the end of the month. Thus in the last three months the United States alone has added at least 659,000, 1,185,000, and 1,408,000 tons to the stockpile of United Nations shipping. And in the same period the reopening of the Mediterranean has contributed another huge increment. These gains are an accentuation of an earlier trend, for 488,000 and 664,000 tons were added in January and February.

Another gauge of progress is the destruction of submarines. For only two recent months, March and May, do we have any figures for this. British estimates for these months are seventeen and thirty, and thus in May the losses probably exceeded the estimated building rate of twenty. While this is good news, we must remember that the enemy has from 300 to 500 U-boats, of which from 100 to 150 are in operation at one time. Far more serious for the Germans is the loss of skilled commanders and well-trained crews. The recent practice of placing one skilled commander in charge of an entire "wolf pack" has made good leadership more effective than in the earlier days of the war, but men like Prien are still the first to be killed.

Such figures as these are in no sense absolute. For instance, we have no statistics on time losses for damaged ships; and, on the other side, the very considerable ship output of the British Isles and Canada is not included. But it is noteworthy that the sharpest reduction in sinkings occurred during the best hunting months of the year. All these things are reliable indications, though not a complete guide, to the situation in the Atlantic. Average losses of 550,000 tons a month are bound to delay the day of victory, but unless Germany can increase them enormously it is certain to be defeated in the end.

The most encouraging aspect of this improvement is that it has been brought about by something more substantial than a periodic subsidence of submarine warfare. Earlier anti-submarine efforts were often poorly organized and directed. There were certain "blind" areas; various agencies duplicated each other's work; a common command was lacking. After the Casablanca conference the Allies worked out a scheme whereby the British and Canadian navies assumed responsibility for guarding the convoy lanes to Europe in the middle and eastern Atlantic, while the United States provided protection in the western and southern Atlantic.

Much of the progress made is due to the larger quantities and far better quality of anti-submarine weapons. Our navy, like the British, long neglected the unspectacular drudgery of improving on the technical means of combating the U-boat. The outbreak of war found us trying to beat the 1941 German U-boat with the weapons of 1918. And we did not even have enough of those. Of course the full story of the development of new secret weapons and the multiplication of old ones will not be told before the end of the war. However, we know that several new types of patrol vessels, including the destroyer escorts now being produced in mass, are becoming available. Radars and improved hydrophones are in use, and the escort plane carrier has proved its value. Recently, after a severe internal struggle, the navy adopted helicopters, which have the advantage of being able to operate from a limited deck space. The peak in our production of anti-submarine weapons will not be reached until 1944, but the present turnout is impressive. In fact, as is the case with all weapons, the defense seems to be rapidly catching up with the offense.

Finally, the persistent pecking away at U-boat bases and production centers is apparently at last having some effect. Submarines in port can be almost perfectly safeguarded by bombproof shelters, but these "garages" cost too much in time and labor to be constructed everywhere. Nor can the many factories making engines and other parts be adequately protected against the precision bombing of our Fortresses and Liberators.

The main instruments, then, of our present limited success have been an increased output of new and old weapons and aerial bombing. Inasmuch as the peak of both is still approaching, our outlook for achieving control of submarines is relatively bright. We are sure to have individual bad months, and the U-boat will remain a danger as long as the war lasts, but we have already surmounted the worst period. One of the teachings of Mahan has again been vindicated: the guerre de course, or war against commerce, causes grave difficulties, but alone it does not win wars.

The value of the U-boat has been emphatically proved by the very troubles it has created for the United Nations. Shortage of merchant tonnage prevented our launching a land attack for nearly a year after Pearl Harbor. All through 1942, while the war at times hung in the balance, we were unable to intervene effectively. And today, even though we appear to have gained the upper hand at sea, our difficulties in concentrating the men and supplies needed for an effective invasion of Europe may give Hitler one more chance to win the war in Russia.

In the Pacific the war of attrition is being waged under fundamentally different conditions. Here Japanese submarines, crippled by the distance of their bases, have made very little effort to interfere with our seaborne transport of men and supplies. We, on the other hand, are definitely on the offensive, and in eighteen months of war have destroyed more than 200 enemy merchant ships, or nearly 100,000 tons a month. Our submarines are less numerous than those of the Germans, operate from more distant bases, and have far fewer targets. In view of these facts their success has been nothing short of astonishing. Very few have been lost, and the toll of enemy shipping, while small compared to our losses in the Atlantic, represents an even greater proportion of the Japanese merchant marine. Its replacement will also impose a far greater strain on national resources.

While the outlook here is relatively encouraging, Americans have always had a tendency to take too much for granted with respect to Japan—a habit of mind which not even our defeats at Japanese hands have eliminated. The conclusion is being drawn in some quarters, for example, that because our sinkings of enemy merchant ships exceed the pre-war output of Japanese yards we are therefore winning the war of attrition, and Japan's far-flung island empire will ultimately fall from inability to keep open its lines of communication. Such a conclusion is not warranted by the facts. It is quite likely that Japan has not made the phenomenal increase in shipbuilding of the United States; but it is ridiculous to judge its present output by pre-war standards. The Japanese are being hurt by the kills of our submarines, but they are certainly not being defeated. In short, we must not mistake our gains in either the Atlantic or the Pacific for decisive victories.

10 Years Ago in "The Nation"

ANOTHER NATION to throw sand in the gears of the creaky international machinery is Japan. A very definite check to progress at Geneva has resulted from Mr. Sato's announcement that Japan would demand naval equality with Great Britain and the United States in 1935 . . . to maintain control over vast territory on the Asiatic mainland. . . . It may have the one salutary effect of impelling the United States to draw closer to the nations of Europe and to Russia. Isolation is a desirable quality only when it pays to be isolated.—June 7, 1933.

DISCLOSURE BEFORE the Senate Banking and Currency Committee that Morgan and his nineteen partners, including such celebrities as Thomas Lamont and E. T. Stotesbury, paid no income taxes in this country for 1931 and 1932 . . . has excited tremendous surprise and no little indignation. . . . I am reminded, incidentally, of the severe lecture which Mr. Lamont read the Senate Finance Committee eighteen months ago on the deficiencies of Congress. He was thoroughly dissatisfied with the manner in which the country was being governed. . . . It would appear that he might have done better to leave criticism of the government to those of us who pay the costs.—PAUL Y. ANDERSON, June 7, 1933.

MAGISTRATE BENJAMIN GREENSPAN of New York City has dismissed the case brought by the Society for the Suppression of Vice against the Viking Press for publishing Erskine Caldwell's novel, "God's Little Acre." . . . Mr. Sumner, head of the Society for the Suppression of Vice, had protested that no consideration should be given to the defense of the book made by various literary critics because, so he said, literary critics were to be regarded as "abnormal people." To this Magistrate Greenspan replied: "The court is of the opinion that this group of people, collectively, has a better capacity to judge the value of a literary production than one who is more apt to search for obscene passages than to regard the book as a whole."—June 7, 1933.

WITH THEIR CUSTOMARY foresight, the railroads have contributed their bit toward industrial recovery and the restoration of purchasing power by announcing that they will ask their employees to take another 10 per cent wage cut.—June 21, 1933.

Tensions in British Politics

BY REINHOLD NIEBUHR

London, May 30

THE questions most frequently asked by British friends of American visitors concern the party struggle in America and the continuance of strikes. Britons find both conditions in America quite incomprehensible. One has to explain that the American constitutional system does not permit of so complete a truce in party conflict as prevails over here, since even if the President invited more Republicans into the Cabinet the Congress would still not be bound to keep the truce.

In regard to our strikes I think the British have a rather exaggerated impression, and I have sought to assure them that on the whole we have lost very few labor hours in strikes. They find John L. Lewis an intriguing figure and are somewhat mystified by his political motives.

It goes without saying that President Roosevelt is extremely popular over here. The British feel that he understood the world situation from the beginning. I was assured by one American that Roosevelt was actually more popular than Churchill, but I do not think that is so. It is true of course that liberal and labor people are critical of Churchill on domestic policy and are inclined to compare his general domestic orientation with Roosevelt's, to the disadvantage of Churchill; just as our conservatives express their disapproval of Roosevelt by their admiration for Churchill.

On the other hand, Churchill has a quite remarkable hold on the whole population. For the first time in my many visits to Britain I find that photographs of someone besides royalty dominate the store windows. The King and Queen are popular enough, as they always will be in the British scheme of things. But one sees pictures of Churchill everywhere. When I asked a friend about this he spoke with great emotion of the service Churchill had rendered the nation in the dark hours and months of their deepest anxieties, when he expressed the British courage and dogged determination to carry on so robustly and so eloquently. In the days after Dunkirk he both created and expressed a nation's determination, and a hope for which little justification could be found in the actual military situation.

Few leaders have the good fortune to become so wedded to their people by tragic circumstances. The difference between Roosevelt's and Churchill's political fortunes at this point is very great. Future historians may assess very highly Roosevelt's contribution in anticipating the realities of this conflict, which the nation as a whole did not foresee. But whatever our peril, it was not immediate or obvious enough to make a deep impression on the imagination of the people.

There is this difference also: that most Britishers speak of the days of their "appeasement" policy with disgust, even if they happen to have been champions of it. If they were, they give Churchill credit for understanding what they did not understand. We could hardly find such a mood of contrition among our "isolationists."

Churchill's popularity and the party truce do not of course eliminate all political tensions; and democracy would be dead if this were the case. The government's failure to do anything positive with the Beveridge report has left labor very dissatisfied. Labor is apprehensive that on the day of victory even the tentative promises of implementing the report will be forgotten. One prominent non-labor observer suggested that as the international outlook became brighter he could already discern a tendency among privileged groups to withdraw the measure of approval which they had given the Beveridge plan. He thought it would be the old story of "When the devil is sick the devil a monk would be."

Despite the various points of friction between the Conservatives and Labor, it now seems quite likely that the party truce may continue for some time after the war. There is every indication that Churchill's suggestion for an inter-party government, made in his address on post-war problems, will be accepted in some form or other. I have been a little surprised at the unanimity with which this idea is regarded as a probability even by those who do not approve of it. But upon examination it is not surprising. First of all, barring some unforeseen calamity, Churchill's prestige will be much too high after the war to be successfully challenged by the Labor Party. Labor might reduce the present Tory majority, but it would certainly not be able to establish a majority of its own. It therefore sees greater possibilities of gaining some advantages in post-war reconstruction by exerting pressures inside a national government than by being completely on the outside after losing an election.

A contributing cause of this state of affairs is undoubtedly the lack of any really powerful leadership in the labor movement. Sir Stafford Cripps is for the moment non-political, in the sense that as Minister of Aircraft Production he is successfully conducting one of the big administrative jobs. Though, unlike our various production "czars," he is a member of Parliament, he is not now an active parliamentarian. The strongest leader at the moment is undoubtedly Herbert Morrison. His political authority has eclipsed that of Bevin, who is now merely highly respected as a first-rate "man-power" administrator and who speaks little on great political issues.

There are able men in the labor leadership for the day-to-day problems of administration, but there is no one who would give new intellectual or moral content to the labor cause or marshal popular emotion behind it. Some of the most vocal critics of the government are in fact not labor people at all but the Common Wealth group around Sir Richard Acland, which represents middle-class radicalism with a strong tinge of Christian socialism. There is also a group of young Tories who are about Disraeli's business of refurbishing up the old Conservative creed with new and more radical meanings. This group supports the Beveridge plan, though with some reservations, and wants the "public" schools of Britain—that is, the private schools—democratized.

Stalin's dissolution of the Comintern has aroused more enthusiasm in left-liberal than in labor circles. The liberal News-Chronicle is taunting labor leaders for their lukewarm attitude toward the new Stalin line. The Labor Party executive has already acted on the plea of the Communist Party to be allowed to join the Labor Party. It had been widely assumed that the dissolution of the Comintern would alter the determination of the Labor Party not to let the Communists affiliate. But labor has stood pat. The executive declares that the new situation affects only one of their two objections to the Communist Party. It removes the objection that the Communist Party is subject to foreign control but does not alter the fact that it believes in revolution.

The left-liberal critics of labor point to this stand as proof of the stodginess and general lack of progressive imagination in labor. They may be right. On the other hand, the attitude of the non-labor enthusiasts for the Russian cause seems a bit too certain of the consequences of the dissolution of the Comintern.

There is probably no greater difference between the general public opinion in America and that in Britain than on this question of Russia. Even before the dissolution of the Comintern it was quite apparent that the closer comradeship in arms between Russia and Britain, the gratitude of Britain for the support given to the common cause by Russia, and the feeling that Russia and Britain must cooperate in peace as well as in war had made the British attitude toward Russia more cordial than ours; and the difference runs through all ranks from the most conservative to the left. In that sense the intransigence of labor is somewhat surprising.

On the left the debate on Russia seems to be for the moment paramount. One hears little about India, though I write some typical Bloomsbury leftists are carrying banners down the street protesting against Gandhi's continued imprisonment. Until I saw them I was afraid that India had dropped out of sight.

TOTAL WAR: Radio station WCHS, of Charlestown, West Virginia, is sending out promotional literature in the form of a questionnaire satirizing government questionnaires. A typical item is, "Give names, addresses, color, race, and creed of five citizens other than relatives who were present at your birth." The station suggests that the form be left blank and mailed to the garbage department.

ENGLISH SCHOOLBOYS, on the other hand, have advanced a suggestion for saving paper. In a letter to the Liverpool Board of Education some boys of that city wrote: "We feel that everybody should make some sacrifice for this great effort. It is the custom of masters here to impose as punishment 'lines'—senseless repetition which we have to write out on sheets and sheets of paper. This is a waste of good paper. We are prepared to stop it if the masters are."

THE COMMON TOUCH: C. E. Gishel, writing on employee relations in Printer's Ink, an advertising trade magazine, tells of a "very smart plan . . . developed by one labor-relations adviser who directed the president of the company to set up a little apartment and to live part of the time right at the plant. By prearrangement this president would be called into the plant every once in a while at two or three o'clock in the morning for consultation when things were not going just right. The workmen were first astonished and then gratified to see the big shot work just as hard as they."

PERHAPS FREUD could explain how it happened. In Ralph Bates's review of Waldo Frank's "South American Journey" for last week's Nation, the first sentence read, "I imagine that most readers will find vastly more pleasure . . . in the vivid incidental music than in the principal theme." The word "music" came out "murder."

FESTUNG EUROPA: The Stockholm newspaper Ny Dag reports that a number of Czechs who had escaped from German labor camps have joined the Yugoslav partisans. . . . The Deutsche Tuberkuloseblatt says, "There has been an alarming increase in the number of cases of lung disease in industrial plants. The cases are of an acute and dangerous character."

Collapse of a Satellite

BY F. C. WEISKOPF

CONDITIONS in the small nations which have been woven into the design of an Axis-dominated Europe are a fairly accurate gauge of the demoralization which is gradually gaining momentum within the Nazi stronghold. Slovakia is a striking illustration. Slovakia was not overrun by German armies, nor has it been governed by a Nazi Kommandantur. The conquest of Slovakia was accomplished before the outbreak of the war, by Munich, and Slovakia was received into the Greater German Reich as an "honored ally." If the Nazis bled Slovakia of its soldiers and carried off the gold in its National Bank and its skilled labor, they did it behind a screen of Slovakian "independence." Slovaks sat at government desks, though their Nazi advisers sat behind them in the shadow.

For a time, immediately after Munich and in the first stages of the war, the fascist elements in Slovakia—the élite of the Hlinka party, the Hlinka Guard, and the Nazified German Volksgruppe—foresaw an easy internal victory, with the whole population won over to the cause of National Socialism. Today all available evidence—the reports of the underground as well as the testimony of the Nazis and their Slovak puppets—indicates very clearly that a wave of deep unrest is sweeping over the country from the Danube to the Carpathians.

Moreover, the belief in German invincibility has been destroyed. Defeatist rumors flood the country. "The people, terrified by bad news, are losing their desire to work and their faith in the future," said Monsignor Tiso, President of Slovakia, in an article published last spring. "We must all work against this terrible infection," he continued, "mainly by showing that we ourselves are not stricken with it. A good Slovak does not allow enemy propaganda to influence him. He lives confidently, he works ceaselessly, and he faces the future calmly." Little is left of the vigor and confidence that prevailed in September, 1940, when Tiso felt sure that Slovakia was "on the road to unprecedented glory."

The causes of the "defeatist infection" and the rising unrest are found in the rapid deterioration of the standard of living resulting from the Nazis' systematic looting of the country and in the disastrous fate of the two Slovak divisions sent to the eastern front. When news of the complete rout of the East Slovak Division in the Kuban valley, of the desertion of several companies to the Russians, and of the cruelly suppressed mutiny of the Third Infantry Regiment reached the homeland early this year, both the Hlinka Guard and the Gestapo were put to considerable trouble to control the agitation. In March the strong man of the Slovak puppet government, Sano Mach, issued a decree closing "all bars and cafes suspected to be centers of whispered propaganda." One of the largest movie theaters of Bratislava was closed in April after repeated demonstrations by the audience over newsreels of the war. When Adolf Hitler's picture appeared on the screen with the inscription, "Help me, and you're helping yourself," people laughed and shouted, "Stop the war! Stop the slaughter of our Slavic brothers!" The strength of the defeatist mood was acknowledged by one of the leading Slovak Quislings, Professor Bela Tuka, in a speech at Zilina. After condemning the "political guerrillas in Slovakia . . . not only Jews, Czechs, and Bolsheviks but also their helpers and followers," Tuka asserted vehemently that "to think, to discuss, or even to admit the possibility of a victory of the other side is treason; defeatists should be shot."

Anger and hatred, sabotage and resistance are the people's response to the Nazi policy of plunder and coercion. The Food Administration of Slovakia has had to order the seizure of cattle "at the source." The administration was forced to take this step by "the total failure of the system of relying on voluntary discipline and patriotic duty." And Adolf Hitler's paper, the Völkische Beobachter, has admitted that Slovak sugar-beet growers in 1942 tilled only 80 per cent of the 1941 acreage, despite the incentive of higher prices.

Industrial sabotage has markedly increased during the past year. The German-language paper of Bratislava, the Grenzbote, which is directed by State Secretary Karmasin, the Führer of the German Volksgruppe in Slovakia, has repeatedly attacked the paper, metal, and textile plants for allowing "tool damage, slowdowns, and output of poor quality." One of the boldest acts of sabotage was the bombing of the new munitions factory at Szisska Nova Ves. Another wrecked the Bata Shoe Works at Simovany; 20,000 pairs of boots for the German army were burned and precious machines were ruined.

Opposition to the Nazis and their Slovak henchmen manifests itself vividly in the attitude of the people toward the Jews. Anti-Jewish propaganda has utterly failed. Anti-Jewish decrees are widely disregarded. The newspapers of the Hlinka Guard and the German Nazis in Slovakia are filled with reports of trials of violators of the anti-Jewish laws. For example, the district court of Kosice sentenced the farm hand Josef Drotar to five months' imprisonment because he had sheltered in his hut eight young Jewish refugees. An article in the Grenzbote of April complained bitterly that "the Slovak population in eastern Slovakia still tries to protect Jews and to keep them in jobs."

Catholic and Protestant clergymen are openly taking issue with the anti-Jewish policy enforced by the Nazis. On January 30, 1942, the Gardista, organ of the Hlinka Guard, reported that a Greek Catholic priest, Father Michal Slabata of Lastovce, had been sent to the concentration camp of Ilava because he "baptized thirty-six Jews to save them from deportation."

After the Protestant church had protested against the growing loss of religious freedom and of the dignity of man, seven of the eight Catholic bishops issued a pastoral letter condemning "sentences without trials," defending their right to baptize Jews, and demanding that state protection be extended to every citizen irrespective of nationality or creed. This step of the bishops is the more important because the Hlinka party, main pillar of the fascist regime in Slovakia, is a Catholic party.

Last winter defeatism became so widespread that the policy of suppressing all news of it was abandoned and the press and spokesmen of the Hlinka Guard began to campaign against persons preparing "alibis in the event of a victory for the other side." The Gardista referred to "those armchair strategists who are talking as if the Red Army would walk through the streets of Berlin in a week or so, and as if American scouts were already appearing at the Brenner Pass." As an example of the growing boldness of the "alibi seekers" the same paper cited the publication of a book entitled "Theory of Literature," by Professor Mikulas Bartok. This book, it said, "even contains a contribution by a Soviet Jew." What is worse, it "was named as one of the best books of the year by a number of artists, actors, writers, and other intellectuals."

Listening to Allied broadcasts seems to be a general practice to judge from the number of persons tried for tuning in on London, Moscow, and sometimes the short-wave broadcasts from Boston. The grim business of stamping out "black listening" was enlivened by an amusing incident reported in the fascist press. A certain radio operator in a small town felt an unholly curiosity about the London broadcasts of the Czechoslovak government-in-exile. One day he succumbed and tuned in, forgetting in the excitement of the moment to switch off the town's loud-speaker system. Suddenly the surprised townspeople heard anti-Nazi propaganda trumpeted through the streets. The populace demonstrated, the local fascists were in a panic, and the radio operator was sent to a concentration camp.

No sketch of the situation in Slovakia would be complete without mention of the general hatred for the neighboring Axis partner, Hungary. So strong is this feeling that even the puppet government and the Hlinka Guard must bow to it and emphasize from time to time their dislike of their comrades-in-shame of Budapest. Slovak public opinion, moreover, is showing a tendency to favor the restoration of the Czechoslovak Republic. Even Axis sources admit the existence and strength of this trend; from 80 to 85 per cent of the total population is said to support it.

The drive for Slovak volunteers to be sent to the eastern front failed spectacularly. According to a recent report from the underground movement to the Czechoslovak government-in-exile, Sano Mach, the most ardent of Hitler's Slovak puppets, was called to Germany and asked to furnish the Führer with 10,000 Slovak volunteers. He promised to do so, and his assistant, Murgas, started a mammoth recruiting drive. Just fifty-seven volunteers were garnered. Whispered rumors and jokes in Slovakia have it that after the result had been announced at a meeting of the Slovak Cabinet, one of the ministers proposed to shoot the fifty-seven recruits at once in order to save transportation costs to the eastern front, where they would either surrender or be killed anyway.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

MORE and more the Nazis are directing their remarks about "bad morale" toward the upper rather than the lower levels of society. At the end of May the newspapers of the province of Hesse-Nassau published an article by Gauleiter Weinreich attacking once again the "fantastic rumors" being circulated—rumors, it said, which were spread "especially by high-titled dummies." "These people should not imagine," it continued threateningly, "that we do not know how to deal with them. We have handled others like them. Our methods have not become gentler in these days, and we do not forget that the chancellors of the German Reich at the beginning and the end of the last war were called von Bethmann-Hollweg and Prince Max of Baden."

Even today many thousands of German families do not know what happened to their relatives who fought at Stalingrad. That is the reason for a drive which has been officially named "Stalingrad Information Service." The Neue Wiener Tageblatt of May 7 printed the order authorizing it, but nowhere else has it received any publicity. In troop quarters, barracks, and similar places a notice has been posted asking all who took part in the Stalingrad campaign to write out anything they may know about the fate of any comrade and hand it in to their superior officer. Information so obtained is "cleared" in various centers, to which the relatives of soldiers can address inquiries. The authorities considered it necessary to state expressly that "families making inquiries must be treated pleasantly and given any needed assistance."

One might have thought on June 6 that one had been carried back to the best days of the Nazis. At least that would have been the impression of anyone who had a glimpse of the Berlin Sportpalast or tuned in on a German radio station. Crashing music, a forest of flags. Theatrical entrance of delegations. A galaxy of party pashas and generals. An audience that at the given signal rose to its feet and roared in transports of ecstasy. And the exalted tone of the radio announcers!

What was staged so pretentiously was this: "For the first time the Führer is allowing the German people to be given more exact facts about the gigantic development of our arms production."

The task was assigned to Albert Spee, the Minister of Munitions. In his speech Herr Spee declared that Germany possessed greater armaments in May, 1943, than at any time before. And to support his claim he gave some figures. They were not figures of absolute quantities but comparative figures. And the comparison was between the month of May, 1943, and the already remote "monthly average of 1941." Thus the production of locomotives in May was stated to have been three times as large as the 1941 average; that of munitions, six times; of cannon, four times; of heavy trucks, twelve times. The number of persons employed in war industries, in spite of the stream of inductions into the army, was stated to be 23 per cent higher than a year ago—and with that we have almost everything that the Minister imparted to his audience. U-boat production he did not mention. Of aircraft he said that even comparative figures would be too useful to the enemy to be revealed.

Of course the figures would have told little even if they had been correct. Nobody knows what the "average of 1941" was. It may have been very low. In any case Germany faces quite different enemies and a quite different enemy production from those it faced in 1941.

It is interesting that German propaganda felt the pressure of Allied production figures. The public must have found it suspicious that the exact German figures were never set off against them. Hence the sudden announcement of the pseudo-exact figures—with the maximum pomp and circumstance. Goebbels himself left no doubt about the purpose. He followed the speech of the Minister of Munitions with one of his own—one of his most excited and screaming speeches—which showed plainly what ideas in German heads the grandiose celebration was to sweep away. "Nor is the potential of the enemy unlimited," he cried. "With respect to number of workers he simply cannot attempt to compete with us. It is only boasting that he understands better. But we have no reason to be disturbed by the enemy's fantastic figures. The Jewish numbers-acrobats cannot make us nervous."

Papal Guidance

POPE PIUS'S speech last week on the "labor question" may have a demoralizing effect upon large sections of the European underground. It was made before 20,000 workers from every part of Italy, who crowded the transportation lines to the Vatican with the beneficent approval of the Fascist authorities. At least three times the Italian workers heard the Pope specifically condemn revolution.

"False prophets would have us believe," said the Pope, "that salvation must come from a revolution which will overturn social order and assume a national character." But, he insisted, "your salvation does not lie in revolution." And again, "Salvation and justice are not to be found in revolution but in an evolution through concord."

In short, as the time approaches when the Allies will need all the help they can get from the Italian workers, their spiritual adviser tells them not to revolt. Obviously, the speech was not intended purely for Italian consumption. It was very promptly dispatched, by cable and radio, to all parts of the world. And it must have hit with equal force in other countries where the job of the underground and guerrilla fighters is primarily revolutionary; that is, in Germany, Hungary, Bulgaria, Rumania, and to a lesser extent France. Revolution in those countries is indispensable to the establishment of democracy, but in Italy and Hungary, at least, the influence of the Catholic church can be decisive. If Catholics in those countries take their guidance from the Pope, their aid will be withheld from the underground.

Nowhere in his speech did the Pope attempt to give guidance to Catholics in countries where the task of the underground worker is primarily to wage a war for national liberation—Norway, Holland, Belgium, Greece, Yugoslavia, Czechoslovakia, and Poland. But much can be inferred from recent Vatican broadcasts emphasizing the "constant solicitude" and the "feelings of sympathy and affection" which the Holy See has for Poland. It appears that the Vatican would not object to Catholic participation in the liberation of countries under direct Nazi administration.

The anti-revolutionary parts of the Pope's speech have a significant relationship to the numerous rumors circulated during the past two years to the effect that the State Department is planning to back post-war reactionary regimes in just those countries where the underground is working for revolution. In the countries where the underground is working chiefly for national liberation, on the other hand, conservative elements welcome a certain amount of underground assistance; after liberation there will still be the possibility of by-passing leaders whose principal aim is the establishment of democracy.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Mr. Lippmann's Realism

U. S. FOREIGN POLICY: SHIELD OF THE REPUBLIC.

By Walter Lippmann. An Atlantic Monthly Press Book.

Little, Brown and Company. $1.50.

FOR generations America cherished the shibboleth of independence and refused to face the reality of interdependence. We did that which was right in our own eyes, and without caring to investigate what the others were doing, we sternly told them not to. Old Romans, pacifists, and humanitarians shared in that flattering delusion.

A delusion it was, and Walter Lippmann exposes it without mercy. A country whose commitments are out of all proportion to its means of action is literally "insolvent." We shouldered two heavy commitments, the Monroe Doctrine and the Open Door in China. Now for many years we had no power to enforce the policies we had proclaimed. If Germany did not grab southern Brazil, if Europe did not partition China, the one obstacle was not our fiat but the British navy. While we were twisting the lion's tail, the lion was faithfully guarding our gates.

I may add that no power on earth is equal to its commitments. Denmark was not equal to its modest commitments—to preserve its neutrality and independence. England and France were not equal to their commitments—to defend the European order and their own empires. Their "insolvency" is patent. To be fully solvent, each power should have armaments equal to those of the rest of the world combined.

This confirms Lippmann's main thesis: that safety can be found only in a combination of armaments and alliances. Not purely Machiavellian alliances, among nations which thoroughly distrust one another, but genuine ententes among peoples which have deep and permanent interests in common. The model of such alliances, according to Lippmann, is the tacit understanding which for 120 years has linked England's policies with ours.

Lippmann feels, however, that a formal alliance, a "Union Now" with the British Commonwealth alone, is an impossibility. I heartily concur. The world dreads Anglo-Saxon supremacy and would band together to resist it. We have no desire to underwrite the British Empire as at present constituted. We do not want to be embroiled in the problems of Europe, and England, most reluctantly no doubt, is an integral part of Europe. The "nuclear" alliance advocated by Lippmann should include, at once and on equal terms, Russia and probably China.

The word "nuclear" is capital. Lippmann wants the alliance to be opened, gradually, to all like-minded nations. His plan is not sheer power politics, or a revival of that ancient fallacy, balance. We want to destroy forever the balance between the forces of order and the forces of disruption. The "nuclear" alliance is intended to develop into a world commonwealth. But power, unquestioned and wisely wielded, is necessary to permit the growth of such a complex and delicate organization.

This, by the way, was Clemenceau's idea. He was not averse to the world republic adumbrated by the League of Nations. But he wanted, for a generation at least, a "nuclear" alliance between England, France, and America. We induced him to abandon material defenses—the Rhine as a permanent military frontier—in exchange for the promise of such an alliance. Then we tore up the alliance, sabotaged the League, and called Clemenceau a wicked old man.

I like Lippmann's tough-minded realism. If Wilson had told the world, and America, that our motive was enlightened selfishness, his case would have been far stronger. We were then, we are now, defending in Europe the frontiers of American life and security. If this had been understood, we could not, virtuously and vainly, have attempted to exact repayment from our comrades in arms. They did not "hire the money" any more than we "hired their soldiers." We fought in a common cause.

However, a tough-minded realist has no right to say: "Therefore we must consider first and last the American national interest." An unimpeachable sentiment, no doubt; but a sentiment all the same. For a true realist and rugged individualist, the only proper rule is: "Myself first, and last, and all the time!" I admit that in defending our territory we are defending our way of life; but as the Hibernian would say, no way of life is worth dying for. I shamelessly confess that in fighting for America I am fighting for a principle which I identify with my own dignity—a very quixotic thing to do. And a principle ignores boundaries: there are servants of liberty in Germany, and fascists in America.

From the point of view of the realistic historian, the weakness of Lippmann's book is that he ignores Europe west of the Curzon line. That Europe does exist, although Hitler is turning it into a hideous caricature. It will never accept dictation from either the English-speaking world or from Russia. United, as it must and shall be, it will inevitably upset any "order" that we might attempt to impose. For a Western European the current talk about the Big Four would be offensive, if it were not naive. Mr. Lippmann's book therefore needs an additional chapter. But with the ten chapters he has written I am in accord, an accord full of subtle dissonances, as required by the laws of modern music.

ALBERT GUÉRARD

Isak Dinesen

WINTER'S TALES. By Isak Dinesen. Random House. $2.50.

WE NOW know Isak Dinesen to be Baroness Blixen of Denmark. It was apparent from the first that the author who published, in complete pseudonymity, "Gothic Tales" in 1934, was a woman, a native of Northern Europe, and a person whose sources were in some manner attached to the feudal tradition. "Gothic Tales," because of their exuberance (severely regulated as it was), their civilized bitterness and range, their brilliantly informed fantasy, were clearly an end product of some kind. They had the quality, under the surface classicism of their style, of that sparkling improvisation contrasted with melancholy reverie so usual in Romantic music: the romance of the incompletely lighted and fantastic nineteenth-century "soul," at the end of one thing as much as at the beginning of another; caught back into nostalgia for the past and filled with premonitory anguish. But unlike Romantic music, these tales came to some sharp conclusions. Their intellectual underpinning was sturdy. They were highly conscious productions. The author behind them was not one to be taken in, least of all by herself.

"Out of Africa" (1938) brought the unknown author before us in the round. An autobiographical account of Baroness Blixen's life as owner of a coffee plantation in Kenya Colony, it showed exactly what a feudal heritage had given this woman, and to what use she had put inherited ideas of responsibility. Her growth as an artist is also described; so that the reader, having read "Gothic Tales" with only the information he could deduce from it, comes to any later work knowing more than one usually knows concerning a modern writer. He knows, for example, the writer's courage, both physical and moral, having watched it at work in rude and isolated surroundings. He knows by the facts and their manner of presentation that she is as tender as she is courageous, as profoundly perceptive as she is sensitively humane.

The new book is not "Gothic Tales" all over again. The inventive extravagance has been reduced; the stories do not multiply, one within another, in the earlier manner. They share the simplicity and background, often, of the folk tale. But unlike the folk tale, they do not repeat some obsession of the simple mind—fear, desire for power or wealth or luck or freedom from restriction. And it is interesting to see how completely they differ from those "fairy tales" composed by Isak Dinesen's fellow-countryman, Hans Christian Anderson. In Anderson the folk tale took on, for all his charm of treatment, elements of sentiment and "rise": the Ugly Duckling is a far more bourgeois character than Cinderella. The majority of the characters in "Winter's Tales" aren't going anywhere, in the success-story sense. And those who have some selfish or insolent plans for themselves are soon taken down by unforeseen small circumstance. Destiny's plans, far more noble than any they could have invented for themselves, take over (as in the case of the young wife in The Pearls and the writer in The Young Man with the Carnation). These plans of destiny often have heavy justice in them and work on two planes. The cruel feudal despot who misuses his power (Sorrow-Acre) is baffled not only by the selflessness of his victim but by the unfaithfulness of his wife, whose child by her lover will break the closed line of succession. And at the center of the book stands the child Jens, the pure poet and "comic fabulist" who knows his place in this world without having to be taught it; when he is transplanted from poverty to riches, he can look back on poverty with pleasure, accepting luxury the while, and remember the pleasing elements in the nature of his former friends, the rats.

The blunt and flourishing optimism of middle-class materialism could not have produced these stories. That we get them at this particular period of history is a remarkable thing in itself. They are, it is true, from time to time informed with the sharp bite of the civilized fable. But they are not fables, but parables. They deal almost entirely with inner themes of "love, hate, and reparation"; with spiritual, not "practical," truths. The witty yet profound treatment of the artist and his public in terms of God and Job (A Consolatory Story) sums up the author's view of one problem of reconciliation. Here light is thrown upon a situation by means of irony. Elsewhere Isak Dinesen prefers to irradiate mysteries of conduct by mention of other mysteries, as when, at the end of The Invincible Slave Owners, the perplexed lover, realizing that certain human situations exist which nothing can change, contemplates the waterfall and thinks of the fugue. As in all good parables, the lines of meaning are not pulled tight. The reader is left with the threads in his own hands, and can examine and combine them according to his own experience.

The period quality is exquisitely managed. The publishers, it is true, have built up all the fustian possibilities of this atmosphere. The book is very nearly bound in seafoam and stardust; and one must grin and bear the book-jacket surrealism which runs over on to the end-papers. The little blurbs provided by the publicity department for each story should be ignored; their facts are sometimes wrong and their interpretation almost always queer. These are by no means special or bizarre stories. They belong to an old and great tradition and are worthy of it. That they have been written in English is our good luck, the chance of contact with European tradition at present being what it is. It is good to be able to read them early, even though they are certain to be around for a long time.

LOUISE BOGAN

Concerning Cartels

GERMANY'S MASTER PLAN: THE STORY OF THE INDUSTRIAL OFFENSIVE. By Joseph Borkin and Charles A. Welsh. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $2.75.

ECONOMICS IN UNIFORM: MILITARY ECONOMY AND SOCIAL STRUCTURE. By Albert T. Lauterbach. Princeton University Press. $3.

CARTELS are nearly half a century old, and their operations affect practically every sector of the economic life of most modern countries. Yet a good all-around book on cartels has not been available to the general public. Messrs. Borkin and Welsh, of the Anti-Trust Division of the Department of Justice and of the OPA, set out to provide such a book. In this they have not been too successful. For the specialist and economist their book contains little that cannot be found in such standard works as the reports prepared for the League of Nations in 1930 and 1931, the report and proceedings of the Temporary National Economic Committee, and Dr. Liefman's book. The reader of an outstanding daily and of the liberal weeklies will also find little that is new in the book. In fact, articles such as those which appeared in the New York Herald Tribune in the autumn of 1941 as part of that paper's campaign to release the war economy from the restraints of foreign cartels or those written by Guenther Reimann for the New Republic have covered the ground at least as effectively.

In their effort to write a popular book the authors have adopted a peculiar style and a very strange approach to their subject. The style is flamboyant and fatuous, presumably in emulation of the style of the big-circulation daily and the popular radio program. The chapter headings are as colorful as the title. Here are some examples: I. G.—The Vials of Wrath; The Frozen Rage Across the Rhine; Mosquitoes, Malaria, and Monopoly; Krupp—the Hammer of Thor; The Wizards of Jena; The Sorcerer's Apprentice. The contents of the chapters abound in such passages as: "Without I. G. [Farben] Germany could not, twice within a generation, have filled the vials of wrath and hurled their Prussian acid in the face of the world. What might have been was not to be." Or: "In 1912 explosives for Krupp's cannon were still in hostage to the nitrate beds of Chile. The long hand across the seas dominated by Great Britain was the leash which bound Germany to peace. In 1913 Germany cut the knot by making nitrates out of air. In 1914 Germany went to war!"

Messrs. Borkin and Welsh have adopted a narrative method reminiscent of that of the popular thrillers. An attempt is made to turn the world of dyestuffs, chemical discoveries, and cartel organization into a world of secrets revealed for the first time, plots and counterplots, and diabolical scheming, and highly efficient and precise planning and organization. All that is fundamentally wicked in the modern world, including World Wars I and II, is attributed to I. G. and kindred organizations. German sorcerers succeed in making nitrates out of air, and, bang! Germany goes to war. German sorcerers try again and this time discover how oil can be obtained from coal and rubber from oil. Again the plot is hatched, and again, according to the authors, "war became a certainty. Only time and timing were in doubt."

Despite the devices to which the authors have resorted in order to make their subject popular, it is hardly likely that "Germany's Master Plan" will ever attain best-seller status in view of the mass of detail, quotation, and testimony which the authors have piled up in order to make their plots real and gruesome. This is a pity, because a simple and a balanced account of cartels would be very timely. Balance, however, is necessary simplicity. The chemical world and cartels are not the devils of the piece, nor are they the result of schemes of "artistic and scientific perfection." The rapid development of chemistry just happens to be the principal feature of the modern age, and Germany with its I. G. was not alone in this. The growth of Imperial Chemicals in the British Empire and of du Pont in this country has also been phenomenal. The danger behind cartels is not the masterminds and perfect scheming which Messrs. Borkin and Welsh attribute to them. It is precisely the opposite—stupidity, narrow-mindedness, and cupidity. To be convinced of this one has merely to read Fritz Thyssen's autobiography, "I Paid Hitler." It was because of their stupidity that German business men became easy dupes of Hitler and the Nazis; they became accomplices later, when they had been completely taken in and could not turn back. It is this very stupidity that makes it highly dangerous to allow such powerful tools as cartels to remain in the hands of those who now control them.

"Economics in Uniform" is quite a different sort of book. It is not so amusing as "Germany's Master Plan." It is a scholar's systematic, patient, and thoroughgoing treatise on the evolution of the totalitarian economy. The scope of Dr. Lauterbach's book is admittedly narrow. It is to the world of ideas and concepts in this field, rather than to the physical or outward development of totalitarian economy in its various forms, that the author devotes his efforts. The result is an introduction to the origins, meanings, definitions, and evolution of the concepts of the total economy, serving a limited but, nevertheless, a very useful purpose. This introduction will prove helpful both to the teacher and to the serious student of the economic development of the past twenty-five years.

RIFAT TIRANA

The Unconquered

THE LAST DAYS OF SEVASTOPOL. By Boris Voyetk-hov. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

MIRACLE IN HELLAS: THE GREEKS FIGHT ON. By Betty Wason. The Macmillan Company. $2.75.

AFTER so many solemn tomes about the U. S. S. R. as a political phenomenon it is refreshing to discover that the Russians are still people, not just specimens in a sociological laboratory. Boris Voyetk-hov, a young playwright, takes the Soviet regime so much for granted that he scarcely mentions it and even allows himself the occasional luxury of grousing about official red tape. The destroyer that bore him to Sevastopol dodged shells, mines, bombs, and submarines; at the conclusion of the hellish voyage a party functionary met them at the dock and asked the ship's commissar how many meetings he had held during the trip. "We had a meeting," said the ship's commissar, "to discuss the liquidation of fools like you." The zealous party official went away, showing "neither shame nor regret in his dim fish-like eyes."

Human beings are more absorbing to Mr. Voyetk-hov than political systems. He is interested in the fact that a Russian plane crew, after barely escaping death in a fight with a Heinkel, celebrated by throwing a party for a bear, a donkey, and two foxes, former residents of an abandoned zoo. He notes that the fliers coined silly nicknames for each other. He is amused by their system of awarding each other point scores for bright-cracks which, like witticisms the world over, must surely have sounded funnier at the time than they do in print. He observes that the elderly Sevastopol postmen, having to work underground during the siege, were irked by the lack of house numbers; so they took numbers from wrecked homes above ground and placed them over dugouts.

The Germans, having besieged Sevastopol for eight months, began their third and final land offensive soon after Mr. Voyetk-hov arrived. It opened with an eight-day air offensive during which not only bombs but also scrap metal—"pieces of rail, tractor motors, cart wheels, and plows"—were showered on the city. There was a steady accompaniment of artillery shelling. At the end of this German aerial photographs "proved conclusively that Sevastopol had ceased to exist." It still did exist, however, because the Russians had burrowed. In one of the underground labyrinths hundreds of lathes hummed and rattled, producing mines; light was generated by a tractor motor, "puffing and smoking like a bad old samovar"; a cook and a typesetter worked side by side, and the potato peelings lay among the type.

Perhaps a grim sense of humor saved the sanity of these defenders of Sevastopol. By day the front-line fighters fought with bullets; at night their propagandists fought with words over the radio, blaring at each other's trenches. "The announcers came to know each other well during the siege and loudly reproached each other for professional faults, for bad grammar, poor jokes, traces of drunkenness in their voices, and other technical shortcomings." Sailors were fighting in the front-line trenches, and one evening the German radio promised a motor launch to every deserter. The Russians roared with laughter, and their radio made a record and bounced the magnified laughter back at the Germans.

The incredible heroism of the Russians shines through the incidents Mr. Voyetekhov recounts. One sailor showed his courage in an unforgettably macabre fashion. He was arrested and about to be shot for robbing Russian bodies at night in no man's land. Then he explained: if the Germans had the nerve to go out and rob the dead, he asked himself why he couldn't find spunk enough to go out and collect mementoes of his fallen sailor-comrades to send back to their families. His unit commissar rescued him from execution.

The ordinary people of Greece had the same reckless, courageous zeal to fight the Nazis, but they were not fortunate enough to have a government which expunged traitors in high places. The Greek Minister of War, according to Betty Wason, practically ushered the Germans into the country. Other officials in Athens, euphemistically called "fifth columnists," toadied to the conquerors.

Miss Wason, a young and somewhat naive American radio and newspaper correspondent, tells in the first part of her book about her own experiences in the last days of free Greece and the early days of Nazi occupation. In the second and more interesting part of her book she carries on the story of Greek resistance as she has learned it from underground sources since she got out.

Her picture of guerrilla activities, although necessarily hazy, is the best that has come out. The Gestapo is not so clever after all, for there is a brisk and continuous spy travel in and out of Greece. Some of the Greeks who have become pals with the Nazis actually are compound fifth columnists working for the forces of freedom. Some of the most decorous priests are underground leaders. Three thousand British troops who were left in Greece have joined the guerrilla bands in their devastating raids on trains and arsenals—raids which are planned as carefully as any battle, with Greek girls paving the way for the ambush by being kind to the Nazi guards and giving them too much ouzo to drink. The Greek people still consider themselves at war with the Nazis.

The penalty for being caught is, of course, execution. But the Greeks seem to be as little concerned about death as the Russians. After all, there are so many forms of death all around them—from famine, from exposure, from concentration-camp tortures, and mental death from insanity—that the German threat of execution is not a deterrent. Miss Wason estimates that a tenth of the normal population of Greece already has died from starvation.

Miss Wason is so enthusiastic about Greeks, both ancient and modern, that her book has the flavor of an uncritical eulogy. She does not investigate the reasons why Greek resistance was crippled by intrigue among the leaders, nor

A Running Story of the Working Press

One of the best things about America is its free thinking, loose talking press. This is a personal history of a newspaper man who has worked as copy editor, as reporter, copy reader, national news editor of the Literary Digest, member of the Sunday staff of the New York Times and news editor of PM.

His book reflects the coming of age of the American newspaper man.

And here, lifesize, are the stars of the newspaper world, the men who are shaping its history. Here are F.P.A., Sherwood Anderson, Heywood Broun, Walter Duranty, Ernest Hemingway, and Sinclair Lewis, and many more whose names are as familiar.

does she question whether King George's present government-in-exile in London is truly representative of the Greek people. She accepts the Yugoslav warrior, General Mihailovich, as a great man who knits together the Balkan rebels across national boundaries; perhaps so, but some think differently. Miss Wason lifts a corner of the veil over the dark continent of Europe, but there is much more to be told.

MARCUS DUFFIELD

A Fighting European

MAX NORDAU: A BIOGRAPHY. By Anna and Max Nordau. Published by the Nordau Committee. $3.75.

THIS biography has the fragrance of a bouquet of flowers picked in the garden of memory. But it is much more than that. It pictures a cross-section of the spiritual life on the border line of two centuries as it was reflected in a strong personality in whom manifold knowledge and poetic inspiration harmoniously blended with the love of mankind. By profession Nordau was a physician, a sociologist, a philosopher, a journalist, a playwright, and an art critic, but first and foremost he was a champion of freedom.

Whether we believe in progress or not, there is an unmistakable trend of history manifesting the endeavor of man to be ever more free from both the tyranny of nature and enslavement by his fellow-beings. This struggle for freedom gave birth to the positivism of the nineteenth century, striving to get rid of shackling survivals. Unlimited faith in rationalism explains the unparalleled success which Nordau's "The Conventional Lies of Our Civilization" achieved all over the world sixty years ago. But the author's wisdom surpassed that of his era. Twenty-five years later, in the preface of the fifty-ninth edition, Nordau himself renounced the belief in the irresistible force of reason by admitting that "the feelings stand guard over the 'conventional lies.'" Two others of his books, "Paradoxes" and "Degeneration," in which he continued to attack many sacred cows of prejudice, provoked furious replies even from G. B. Shaw. Nevertheless, Nordau was a better judge of Richard Wagner's megalomania when he wrote, "German hysteria manifests itself in anti-Semitism, that most dangerous form of persecution mania, in which he who believes himself persecuted becomes himself a savage persecutor and stops at no crimes."

Nordau's œuvre, securing him a prominent place in the history of human thought, is but one of the pillars on which his fame rests. After the pogrom of Kishinev and after the Dreyfus affair he became interested, through Theodor Herzl, in the Zionist movement. To Nordau, Zion, the "City of God," meant a community where truth, freedom, and justice rule. He supported wholeheartedly the desire of the persecuted Eastern Jews to create, as he termed it at the First Zionist Congress, a "Jewish National Home." Through his relentless, unselfish work he became, together with Herzl and Zangwill, a recognized leader of the movement. He was, indeed, its prophet when in addressing a hostile audience of Berlin Jews he uttered this warning: "A day will come on which Zionism will be as much needed by you, you proud Germans, as by those wretched Ostjuden whom you fear and hate. A day will come on which you too will beg our help and be suppliants for asylum in that land which you now scorn."

Three years after his death, Tel Aviv, the symbol of his successful efforts, became his resting place. Now his widow and his daughter have put a wreath on this grave. What they have written is not only a truthful account of the interesting life of an interesting personality, not only a vivid picture of Nordau's accomplishments, but a literary accomplishment as well. The great artistic ability of both authors becomes manifest in the objectivity which reveals no suppression of their emotional relationship with their subject; yet they have not written a eulogy. It is a graceful, captivating biography of a great European who was born in Hungary, became a German author, lived in France, was exiled in Spain, fought for Zion, and remained a true humanitarian all his life.

Fiction in Review

BURDENED by its uningratiating title, by the fact that it is a novel by a newspaperman (for we have little reason to think that journalism is a good training school for fiction), and even by a dust-jacket whose quaintness is maniacally designed to drive away readers, Ira Wolfert's "Tucker's People" (L. B. Fischer, $3) is the surprise literary package of the season—the most thoughtful and talented novel I have read this year. Mr. Wolfert is correspondent for the North American Newspaper Alliance, a Pulitzer prize-winner in reporting, and author of "The Battle of the Solomons," but he turns out to be that rarest of creatures, a newspaperman with a notable gift for creative writing. "Tucker's People" is an outstanding novel, the simple statement of whose theme—the numbers racket in Harlem—gives no hint of its emotional and intellectual scope.

"Tucker's People" is a study in gangsterism; its characters are all racketeers, politicians, hangers-on, police, and their families. But this is no Damon Runyonesque novel of the underworld. Mr. Wolfert talks out of his head, not out of the corner of his mouth. If he writes about gangsterism, it is as an aspect of our whole predatory economic structure, and at least by implication his novel is as much a novel of legitimate American business methods and business people as it is of racketeering. Tucker himself had his start in industry as it exists with full benefit of the law; unemployed, he began as a scab, to progress through union racketeering and bootlegging to become czar of the policy game in Harlem. Leo, another of Mr. Wolfert's leading characters, owned a garage before he got caught up in numbers: an honest man, his commodity was space, he sold air surrounded by four walls. What Mr. Wolfert is saying is that gangsters are very little different from their legitimate brothers. They have the same amount of principle, they are driven by the same fears and insecurities, "cutting the world to measure as they can and cutting themselves to measure where they have to." Keep piling pressure after pressure upon people—emotional and economic pressure—and you drive them to destroy themselves and one another; and in such a society the distinction between right and wrong becomes at last a mere legalism.

But "Tucker's People" is not a crude thesis novel. There is no mention of economic or political theory, not a single slogan or call to reform. In the sense that Mr. Wolfert is attacking the entire system of capitalism, he has of course written a "radical" novel, but it is in the sense that his method is the method neither of pamphleteering nor of rabble-rousing but the method of anatomizing society by anatomizing people, that his novel is truly radical. Which comes first, a good society or good people? Mr. Wolfert makes no attempt to answer simple-minded questions. He is a diagnostician; he has no easy cures. But at least he cuts through the whole bleary notion that all you have to do is drop the "Communist Manifesto" in the social slot machine and out will come a whole society of smiling Workers and Peasants. It is significant—indeed, it is of the essence of Mr. Wolfert's view of the unhappy condition of modern life—that his novel draws so heavily upon the insights of psychoanalysis. The fact that his use of what he has learned from psychoanalysis is too heavy-handed—too theoretical and too clinical to serve the best purposes of fiction—may diminish its effectiveness; it in no way invalidates, as an approach, Mr. Wolfert's modulated conception of the relationship between group and individual.

In the last months of Russian victories on the battlefields there has been quite a spate of "radical" novels. As I think back on them, it occurs to me that one thing all their authors have in common is the need to protest their own virtue. In one way or another the novels of Joseph Freeman, Ruth McKenney, Michael Blankfort are all of them long wails of self-justification: "I am in favor of the poor people," "I apologize for my own success," "I am in favor of justice," "I am honest," "I try to be good." But logically enough, Mr. Wolfert protests not at all. He is completely out of his book, and consequently, in the fine paradox of art, he is everywhere in his book—and its best creation. Yet unfortunately, respect and fondness for the author of a novel, while so rare these days as to be startling, are not sufficient substitutes for respect and fondness for his characters. And although we understand Mr. Wolfert's racketeers and feel sorry for them, there is no character in "Tucker's People" whom we love. It is the prime failure of the book, my major qualification in recommending it as a really enjoyable novel. Nor do I think this is due simply to the difficulty we experience in identifying ourselves with gangsters; after all, we are not Moors, but we can identify ourselves with and love Othello. I hope that Mr. Wolfert's inability to involve us deeply, personally, in the fate of his people is not a permanent weakness in his creative endowment but, like his mechanical use of psychoanalysis, part of the self-consciousness of a first novel, which will disappear as he continues to write fiction.

It is a wryly enlightening experience to read Ilya Erenburg's "The Fall of Paris" (Knopf, $3) in the same week with a novel like "Tucker's People." Mr. Erenburg's account of the French defeat is a novel chiefly by virtue of the fact that it is such inaccurate history—another of those literary demonstrations that the Communist Party is the only solution for the ills of the world, and another instance of the vital connection between a writer's prose and his political purpose. For Mr. Erenburg's vague, discontinuous, lifeless, impressionistic prose is the perfect instrument of his political partisanship. It is such a befuddling prose, it so clouds the sequence of historical facts, that I very much doubt whether any but a reader fairly well acquainted with the complex history of modern Europe would realize that in 530 pages on the history of France between 1935 and 1940 there has been hardly a mention of Russia, except as a flag on the horizon, and except for one oblique reference to a newspaper headline, not a single mention of the Soviet-Nazi pact. It is Mr. Erenburg's one-eyed view of what happened in France in this period that while the French workers under Communist leadership clamored to destroy Nazism and die for France, they were sold out by the league between fascism and democracy. All his characters are puppets. On the one side, the side of betrayal and reaction, they are the puppets of ambition, confusion, gluttony, and sex; on the side of the Communists they are the puppets of innocence, courage, self-sacrifice, and even virginity. And what makes confusion twice confounded is that sprinkled among Mr. Erenburg's large cast of fictional characters are several historical figures—Blum, Laval, Daladier—who are intended, I suppose, to give the note of verisimilitudes to Mr. Erenburg's creations.

The difference between "The Fall of Paris" and "Tucker's People" is obvious. Perhaps more interesting is a comparison between "The Fall of Paris" and Aldanov's "The Fifth Seal." I remember that "The Fifth Seal" was thought by many people to be dead because it was anti-Soviet; certainly it was full of political despair. Well, "The Fall of Paris" is full of political hope. Also it is pro-Soviet. But it is one of the dead-est books I have ever read.

OUR text for today is this paragraph from a recent review: "Vladimir Golschmann, who conducted the fifth and last of the season's Serenades at the Museum of Modern Art last night, would seem to be the legitimate successor to Pierre Monteux (rarely heard here any more) in the French style of orchestral interpretation. Only one of the works . . . was of French origin; but all were rendered with that care for tonal delicacy and rhythmic solidity, for sensuousness, logic, and emotional dignity that mark the work of the best French orchestral maestri. For balance, precision, and an authority at once gracious and steely we have had no one like him here in recent years."

Words to make my tongue hang out of my mouth as I rushed, first, to Carnegie Hall to hear Monteux's first broadcast concert with the New York Philharmonic a few weeks ago. As it happened, I retained a twenty-year-old recollection of the silvery sound and beautiful finish of the Boston Symphony's playing under his direction until Koussevitzky's arrival; and on records recently there had been a couple of fine-sounding and well-proportioned performances with the San Francisco Symphony. I went, therefore, with expectations of good things to be heard; and these expectations were satisfied for a few minutes by the sound of "The Star-Spangled Banner" and the opening of the Overture to "Euryanthe." But then I began to hear things which made me wonder whether I was imagining them, until I knew beyond possibility of doubt that I really was hearing a coarseness and raucousness from woodwinds and brass individually and in groups that was without precedent in my experience of major orchestras led by major conductors. And there was no mistaking the faulty structural logic in the performances caused by the unsteadiness of pace, the disproportionate accelerations and retardations, crescendos and decrescendos. There are possible explanations of the technical defects: with an additional two or three hours of rehearsal Monteux might have achieved beauty of sonority and finish. But the musical defects represented only his own musical judgment, his own sense for structural proportion.

Then Golschmann. There was for years in the Columbia catalogue his performance of the Haydn Symphony

No. 103 with the St. Louis Symphony, which was one of the worst performances on records. A year ago Victor issued a recording of his performance of the Couperin-Milhaud "La Sultane" music; and though one might suspect that Victor's recording engineers were responsible for some of the beauty of sound there was no doubt that the orchestra also was playing very beautifully. Next came the superbly recorded performance of Sibelius's Seventh Symphony, which had every appearance of a copy of Koussevitzky's performance—the result being an effective statement of the work, in which, however, one could perceive the absence of the refinements of sonority, execution, and style that Koussevitzky had achieved. And now comes a Victor set (942, $2.53) of Golschmann's performance of Prokofiev's "Classical Symphony." The recording engineers were less successful this time: the sound is marvelously spacious and distinct and true to timbre, but hard and brash. Even with its defects it is vastly better reproduction of orchestral sound than comes off the old Victor records of Koussevitzky's performance; but what is poorly reproduced on these records is a performance that is right in pace, relaxed in feeling, marvelously beautiful in sonority and finish; whereas Golschmann's performance sounds as though he had decided this time to do everything differently from Koussevitzky: the first movement is slower, and comes out tensely over-deliberate; the second is much slower, and comes out dragging; the last movement is faster, an attempt at even more breath-taking virtuosity, and comes out over-driven and strained; and the result of this lack of "logic and emotional dignity" and of "balance, precision, and an authority at once gracious and steely," is a lack also of "tonal delicacy" and the like. But it is possible, of course, that all these succulent qualities were there to be heard at the Museum concert.

Also on Victor's June list is a Corelli Concerto in C major for organ and strings, edited by Malipiero, and played by E. Power Biggs with Fiedler's Sinfonietta (Set 492, $2.63). The music is characteristically engaging and lovely; the performance is straightforward and adequate, except for the heavily insensitive playing in the closing Allegro; and it is reproduced with the harshness of many of the Fiedler Sinfonietta recordings that were made a few years ago. The Concerto takes three sides; and on the fourth side is a little Corelli Sonata in D major for strings and organ—also quite engaging, adequately performed, and harshly recorded.

Columbia offers Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, performed by Mitropoulos with the Minneapolis Symphony (Set 540, $4.73). The work makes pleasant listening when it is suitably played; but Mendelssohn is not a composer for the tense, hard-driving style of Mitropoulos; and the orchestral sound which comes off the records is limited in range at both ends and badly balanced, so that the violins are too weak and are muffled and harsh in quality.

On a Columbia single disc (71463-D, $1.05) Egon Petri plays Busoni's piano transcriptions of Bach's Choral-Preludes "Ich ruf' zu Dir," "In Dir ist Freude," "Wachet auf," and "Nun freut' euch, lieben Christen." The writing for piano is thick and muddy; and further lack of clarity is created at times by the playing and by the poorly balanced recording.

As its record classic for June and July Columbia has chosen another of the outstanding items in its catalogue—the two volumes of Bach's Brandenburg Concertos played by the Busch Chamber Players (Nos. 1-4 in Set 249, $8.67; Nos. 5-6 in Set 250, $6.83). The best works of the group are in Volume I; but even the ones I care little for—Nos. 1, 5, 6—I enjoy listening to in these wonderful performances that were recorded (in England) with such clarity, balance, and beauty of sound.

Several years ago my interest in a program that comprised a Bach Toccata, a Mozart Sonata, and Beethoven's "Diabelli" Variations led me to attend the recital of a pianist whose playing I knew nothing about. And what I heard caused me to write: "Set down Webster Aitken's debut . . . as one of the most notable events of this or any season; for it presented . . . a young man who is already a matured pianist, musician, and artist. . . ." Mr. Aitken is to play the "Diabelli" Variations at the Frick Collection on June 27; and it is something you would do well to hear.

Letters to the Editors

Riding High

Dear Sirs: The ban on pleasure driving may be going down well on the seaboard, but on this perhaps selfish issue the Administration is ruining its last foundation of good-will among the middle classes in western Pennsylvania. It is felt here that Ickes has not the guts to stand up to the vociferous Middle West and intends to confine the ban to the East. As this section abounds in gasoline, which is produced right here and shipped west to Ohio, only a few miles away, where it is used without restrictions, the public feels no patriotic issue is involved. Ohio cars pleasure-drive over our hills with abandon, even though they choose to buy our Pennsylvania gas here instead of in Ohio. Not only do Ohio and the other Middle Western states get more gas on their coupons, but the OPA has learned that illegal coupons virtually are flooding the country, and if there is no checkup on pleasure driving the public will get and use them ad infinitum.

The release of restrictions on the recapping of tires and the easing of requirements for new tires has aggravated the situation, as the public now feels that all it has to do is to finagle the gasoline and it can ride high—except for the OPA pleasure ban. T. A. TENOR

C. O. L. in Canada

Dear Sirs: In the course of an editorial in your issue of May 8 dealing with Prices, Wages, and Taxes, you make the statement that "Canada has met this problem successfully by providing for an automatic increase in wages whenever the cost-of-living index rises 5 per cent."

The Canadian cost-of-living bonus is not quite so simple, nor is it quite so successful as your statement would seem to imply. The bonus is a flat rate paid regardless of the wage rate of the individual worker, and amounts to 25 cents per point rise in the index. The bonus is adjusted on fixed dates every three months if the C. O. L. index has varied by one point or more since the last adjustment.

The main grievances in connection with the bonus are that it has not been applied uniformly to all workers: that is to say, some groups of workers do not receive credit for the full seventeen-point rise in the index: also the bonus has had the effect of freezing substandard wages in certain groups of unorganized workers. Machinery exists for raising substandard wages, but first the workers must organize, and you must know that Canada has no Wagner Act. Need I say more? W. MCKAY

Fascist Methods

Dear Sirs: The death of the famous Italian dramatist Roberto Bracco, recently reported in newspapers, recalls the fact that he, like his friend Benedetto Croce, remained a rabid anti-Fascist and that both suffered the consequences. Their homes were invaded by a mob of young Blackshirts and ransacked. But the method adopted against Bracco was particularly brutal; let me tell it as he told it to me.

Bracco was an old bachelor living with his mother. "When she died," he said, "I left her bedroom just as she had lived in it, with the bed made, the familiar things all around, and I used to go to her room once every day to commune with her spirit." One evening there was a knock at the front door; his old servant opened, and a dozen Blackshirts forced their way in. They rushed directly to his mother's room and demolished it. "Those cowards did not hurt me directly, but through my love for my mother."

Bracco was elected deputy from Campania in 1923 on the anti-Fascist ticket. He was threatened and even attacked in Rome because with fearless honesty he represented the convictions of his electorate and his own. He said to me: "My father was an honest man; I am an honest man; I did my duty regardless of opposition and danger, and here I am, now, in poverty. Mussolini has forbidden the presentation of my plays and all sale of my books. I am ruined."

After having published more than twenty volumes and produced plays that were applauded everywhere, he was reduced to utter want. But his spirit never yielded. And perhaps he saw, in his last months, that before long his enemy, the enemy of all real Italians and the destroyer of Italy, would soon get the punishment he so thoroughly deserves. We hope Bracco may have had that last satisfaction. RUDOLPH ALTROCCHI

Accurate Reporting

Dear Sirs: May I express my belated appreciation of Clement Greenberg's article Goose Step in Tishomingo in your issue of May 29. It's the kind of accurate reporting that usually doesn't come out of a war until afterward—when it's too late anyway. If you keep your eyes open and can tell a hawk from a handsaw, it may be possible to find more truth about the progress of the war in a small Southern town than many a reporter has brought back from Guadalcanal or even the gates of the Kremlin. My congratulations to you and to Greenberg. Such observations multiplied may produce a volume not unworthy to stand beside "The Enormous Room" by E. E. Cummings, the best of its particular genre to come out of the last war.

Open Letter to Louis Fischer

Dear Sir: Although I am not authorized by Winston Churchill to answer the open letter you addressed to him on India I hope you will not take it amiss if I venture to address you on the same subject.

You suggest that the Cripps offer should be repeated by the British government because "perhaps the parties have changed their mind." If this has, indeed, happened and those "parties" are really unanimous about Indian independence, why don't they, for a change, make a proposal to the British government?

Having been on the spot, you know probably better than I do that India is not a country but a world composed of native states and British provinces. Roughly speaking, there are 45 races speaking 200 languages, and countless castes, and tribes fanatically adhering to their religious beliefs and social rules. Don't you think that an India made independent without a precedent agreement between 79,000,000 bellicose Moslems and 200,000,000 pacifist Hindus would be likely to result in a civil war which would be, indeed, an undesirable sideshow to the world conflagration? There seems to me nothing more dangerous than to apply our European or American political terminology to "Indian independence."

You see "a sharp contradiction between the Cripps offer of independence" and Mr. Churchill's refusal to liquidate the British Empire. Presuming that you do not share the view of those isolationists who believe that the independence of some parts of the British Empire could be secured only within the United States, may I ask you whether you do not think that Ireland and South Africa are enjoying more independence than a good many sovereign states, in spite of the British "holding their own"?

Black Market and OPA

Dear Sirs: I am calling attention to the following case for two reasons: (1) The basis for Prentiss Brown's optimism about the chances of curbing inflation should be publicized. (2) I should like to know whether OPA decrees can be enforced without a complainant's furnishing affidavits by witnesses who would not be willing to admit the guilt of black-market trading and without his receiving unfavorable publicity.

Recently a merchant friend informed his local OPA representative that many of his competitors were regularly selling rationed articles without taking ration stamps in return. He did not have to supply the names, for they were already known to the OPA man. My friend asked what could be done to stop the practice. Nothing, he was told. The OPA was not a police agency. If my friend wished, he might, however, file formal charges with the district office of the OPA, including affidavits of persons who had made such illegal purchases. Something might come of it.

My friend did not file the charges. Perhaps he shared or feared the general prejudice against the squealer. Perhaps he could not see the harm to himself except in the unfair competition and thought it not worth the bother. Perhaps he was just lazy. The important fact is that black-market trading by "legitimate" business houses in this small town continues, although it is well known to the OPA or its representatives.

It seems ridiculous for a governmental agency to wait for my friend to furnish the affidavits when they could be obtained much more easily by the agency's own investigators. I wonder, also, whether Mr. Brown hopes to persuade these business men of the poor sense of their ways by radio appeals or whether he considers their indiscretions unimportant.
